I believe the arbitration process, the fact-finding process of arbitration, the economic approach of arbitration to this problem of the jurisdictional disputes which is basically economic in most instances, can best be determined by the administrative law approach through arbitration.

It also has the advantage of being a very quick way of settling these disputes. I do not have to tell the Presiding Officer that time is of the essence in the settling of labor disputes. The longer time is allowed to elapse, the more tempers and discontent are stirred up, resulting in discouragement on the part of workers and determination to resort to economic action. The procedure for settling jurisdictional disputes provided by this conference report bill will result in such delays and conflict that it will prove to be unworkable. It will not lead to quick decisions in settlement of these disputes. Without a procedure that assures quick decisions little or no progress will be made in protecting employers from great losses caused by jurisdictional disputes.

It is the decision that counts. A decision that can be arrived at quickly. As I said at greater length than I shall now, in a speech discussing labor legislation in this session of Congress, let me repeat, Mr. President, if the labor unions knew that if, in the case of a jurisdictional dispute, they did not settle the dispute expeditiously and quickly between themselves, an arbitrator would be appointed whose decision would be binding and final and enforceable in the courts, as I have provided in my bill, we would find very few jurisdictional disputes arising. Of that I am absolutely convinced. I am convinced that, given an effective remedy for the settlement of jurisdictional disputes through arbitration, the labor unions would proceed to develop their own procedures to settle their jurisdictional disputes, short of economic action. But under the conference report bill the cases are to be heard by the Board, and I see nothing in such a procedure but delay and more delay, bogging down and more bogging down, and finally a break-down of the entire procedure.

So, Mr. President, expressing one man's opinion, I say categorically, that in my opinion time will prove, if the bill becomes the law, that it just will not work as a successful procedure for the settlement of jurisdictional disputes.

I deeply regret that at least we do not have in the bill an effective remedy and procedure for settling jurisdictional disputes by means of arbitration.

One of the most objectionable and destructive provisions in the bill is the free-speech amendment made in conference. The Senate bill would have insured both to employers and labor organizations full freedom to express their views on labor matters, but at the same time would have protected employees against a course of conduct by an employer which, although it included statements, was in fact coercive and intimidatory. Under the conference version, however, it is provided in substance that views, arguments, or opinions of the employer may not even be used as evidence of motive, intention, or design, in connection with any unfair labor practices under the act, unless the expressions themselves contain threats of force or economic reprisal, or promises of benefit.

As it was brought out earlier in the debate this afternoon, I believe by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], this is an astounding proposition. Even in the criminal law, views, arguments, and opinions are received as competent evidence of motive. Under this amendment, however, the Board and the courts must close their eyes to the plain implications of speech; and they must disregard clear and probative evidence of motive, or prejudice, or bias. If an employee were discharged for union activities, for example, the Board could not use as evidence of the employer's purpose, any expressions which were not in themselves coercive, no matter how revealing they might be of the employer's true reasons for the discharge. Under this provision, too, an employer could urge his employees to form a union, could suggest a constitution and by-laws, could recommend an attorney, and could propose who the leaders of the organization should be, and he, nevertheless, would be immune from charges of unfair labor practices for forming and instigating what clearly would be a company union in every sense. This is so because, by the clear language of section 8 (c) of the bill, the employer's views or arguments shall not be evidence of an unfair labor practice.

I think we would be far more honest and candid with American labor, and fairer to it, too, if we repealed the act instead of adopting an amendment such as this.

A third respect in which the committee amendments are objectionable to me is the many ways in which they directly destroy or weaken the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act.

For example, an amendment added to section 10 (c) provides that the Board may not order reinstatement or back pay to any individual discharged for cause. Since the Board already can order reinstatement and back pay only to employees discriminatorily discharged, the obvious purpose of the amendment is to permit employers to escape liability for having discharged an employee for his union activities merely if grounds existed which would justify the employee's discharge. There is no reason why, if the proof shows that an employee has actually been discharged because of his legitimate union activities, the employer should be allowed to escape the consequences by showing circumstances or conduct which justified discharge, but which the employer was perfectly willing to tolerate until the employee became active in the union.

We are dealing here, Mr. President, with human beings. We are dealing here with workers who, if an employer wants to check them very, very carefully, day in and day out, week in and week out, over the months, can usually find that at least most of them commit some transgression under the employment rules, on the basis of which an antiunion employer could allege that the discharge was for cause. Under this amendment, Mr. President, when A, an employee who has been guilty of such transgressions but has not been discharged by the employer or, for that matter, has not even had the transgressions called to his attention by the employer, joins a union or becomes active in organizing a union, and the employer hears of that, the employer can immediately discharge him, and then justify his conduct on the ground that, "Well, after all, this employee did violate certain working rules, and the discharge was for that purpose, rather than for the fact that he had participated in union activities." I say, Mr. President, these matters ought to be determined from the standpoint of the realities of labor relations as they exist on the plant level. If the Board, on the basis of a full hearing and a complete record, is satisfied from that record that the underlying cause of the discharge was the employee's union activity and not his so-called transgressions of the employment rules, he should be entitled to reinstatement. Under this amendment, that well-established policy of the Board will be changed; and, once again, the act will be found to be playing into the hands of those employers who want to prevent effective unionization of their plants.

I think it is not an exaggeration to say that, for all practical purposes, this and the "free-speech" amendments leave workers only an illusory protection against discharge for union activities. With the enactment of this bill, every employee will engage in union activities at the risk of his job, for an employer can always find some reason for justifying the discharge, and it will be virtually impossible in any case to establish a violation of the law because statements which in any other proceeding would be perfectly competent evidence are now inadmissible.

Another amendment, which to my mind seriously and directly weakens the protections of the National Labor Relations Act, is the change made in the definition of the term "employer" in section 2 (2). The amendment omits from the concept of employer for purposes of the act, persons "acting in the interest of the employer", and substitutes persons acting as "an agent of an employer," directly or indirectly. The Board and the courts have always held under the present act, that the misconduct of supervisors, foremen, and other employees to whom the management has given managerial responsibilities was chargeable to the employer even though the supervisors were acting beyond the scope of their authority and were not agents of the employer, directly or indirectly, in connection with their activities. After much litigation, this doctrine is now firmly established in the law of labor relations by several decisions of the Supreme Court.

This rule is absolutely essential in labor relations if employees are to enjoy true freedom to organize, because to them the employer is not some corporation or directors or officials—frequently miles removed from the scene of operations. To them the employer is the foreman or supervisor who is the boss. The Board is confronted with this problem of responsibility daily in many cases. Under the amendment, the now well-settled rule is put in question once more. It is once more apparently open to every corporate employer to contend that it is not answerable to the Board for the discriminatory discharge of workers, the establishment of company unions, labor espionage, and other flagrant unfair-labor practices, because the supervisors who committed such acts were not its agents, directly or indirectly, for that purpose. A settled and fertile field is reopened to litigation, employees' rights are hampered, and administration of the statute become immeasurably more difficult. That is another reason, Mr. President, why I say that I think the bill will prove to be administratively unworkable.

Other miscalled minor amendments directly attack and defeat collective bargaining because they place very important restrictions upon the election and collective-bargaining procedures of the act and the Board. I shall not catalog my objections in detail, but the highlights are enough, I believe, to show how destructive the bill really is and how sadly mistaken are those who tell us it works no substantial revisions from the bill the Senate approved.

The amendments require the Board to abandon the highly useful, time saving, and economical device of the prehearing election. The procedure of holding an immediate election, before hearing, in simple representation cases that present no substantial issues, avoids the necessity for many hearings altogether, and often makes collective bargaining possible without delay.

I stressed this point, Mr. President, in our committee hearings when we provided in the Senate bill for the prehearing election. I pointed out in the hearings that there are a great many employers who do not like to ask or join in asking for an election, because in some way, somehow, they have the feeling that if they do they are implying at least to their workers that they want them to organize a union. But those same employers do not particularly object to a prehearing election and then, if the workers have a clear majority, they are perfectly willing to recognize the union and bargain with it collectively.

There has been a great saving of time and, incidentally, a great saving of money for all concerned by these prehearing elections. I think it is most unfortunate, Mr. President, that the provision for prehearing elections has been stricken from the conference report. I think that is a step backward. I think that is another hindrance to collective bargaining. I think it provides another positive delay of early certification. It is going again to impede effective organizational drives on the part of a union. It plays into the hands of employers who wish to resort to dilatory tactics. If the union's claim to majority representation is disclosed by the election to be unsupported, the employer is promptly relieved of any uncertainty by the immediate dismissal of the petition without the delay, expense, and harassment of a hearing. Under the conference amendment, however, the election will always have to be delayed until after the hearing the Board action, sometimes many months later, even though there is no reason why an immediate election cannot be held, except refusal of a recalcitrant employer or union desiring delay to consent.

Under the conference amendment, also, it will hereafter be difficult and perhaps impossible for unions to organize highly integrated enterprises like insurance and public utility companies, which necessarily maintain separate and widely dispersed small operational units. This flows from the conference provision, inserted as section 9 (c) (5) of the bill, to the effect that in determining the appropriate bargaining unit, the extent to which the employees have organized shall not be controlling. In the insurance business and similar far-flung industries organization can proceed only piecemeal by small segments or units. To deny collective bargaining in areas in which organization has been achieved is to deny it entirely. In passing, I invite attention to the fact that this provision is in marked contrast to other provisions which plainly require the Board to find small units appropriate, as in the case of guards, craftsmen, and professional employees.

Collective-bargaining procedures are also unwisely and seriously hampered by the conference bill amendment to the definition of the duty to bargain collectively. Under the amendment, there is specifically excluded any requirement that the parties even discuss the modification of terms and provisions of a contract if the proposed modifications are to become effective before the contract period expires. Anyone familiar with the realities of labor relations knows that collective bargaining does not end with the consummation of a contract. It is not going to help peaceful relations between management and labor in this country if, once a contract is made, the employer or the union may thereafter refuse even to discuss modification of its terms, no matter how unfair or onerous they may have become, because of circumstances that were not foreseen when the contract was signed. A refusal to discuss changes in contracts in such circumstances will be just as apt to cause strikes and lock-outs and bad labor relations, as is a refusal to bargain about working conditions in the first place.

My position on this point, Mr. President, does not mean that I believe that when a union signs a contract it should not live up to the sanctity of its signature on the contract. It does not mean that at all. But here again we are dealing with a problem which is charged with human factors. A contract has been signed, and I take the position this afternoon, as I have taken the position in many cases, that the union, once it signs a contract has no right to strike during the life of the contract if the strike is to force a change in the terms of the contract. That does not mean, however, that the signing of the contract relieves the employer of any and all obligation to discuss any possible modifications of the contract, depending upon the development of unforeseen conditions or misunderstandings as to the meaning of the contract that may have existed at the time the contract was signed. I will come back to that point in just a moment. On the matter of my views as to the importance of a union's signature on the contract I could cite a great many cases, but I will cite only one at this time. I want to cite certain language in a decision which I wrote when I was a member of the War Labor Board in the case of the United States Steel Corp., in which I said for the Board:

> The Board is firmly of the conviction that the integrity of collective-bargaining contracts must be preserved, and the obligations created thereunder must be adhered to by the parties and enforced by the Board in any case which comes before it for decision. Labor as well as management has everything to lose and nothing to gain from violations of collective-bargaining contracts. The entire system of collective bargaining which has been built up in America at such a rapid rate during the past few years, is entirely dependent upon the good faith of the parties in performing their contractual obligations.

I never recognized in the many decisions I have written, Mr. President, the right of any union or employer to violate a contract once they have signed a contract. But I have taken the position that when questions and disputes arise as to what the contract means, or as to whether or not there was any meeting of the minds when the contract was signed, or as to whether or not the development of unforeseen conditions justify a request on the part of either the employer or the union—and I have applied the rule to both sides—for some rectification in the contract in accordance with the grievance procedure or arbitration procedure of the contract, that those questions ought to be considered by the parties in further collective bargaining.

I submit that under this conference report that is not going to be allowed. The parties will be bound by the contract, without an opportunity for further collective bargaining in regard to it. Such an ironclad rule will cause trouble and add to the unworkability of this bill.

I am further disappointed in the conference report bill in that it has digressed from a very vital provision which we had in the Senate bill, a provision which members of the committee know I argued for at some length. It was in and out of the bill, but finally we got it back into the bill. It offered an alternative procedure for the handling of violations of contracts, either on the part of the union or on the part of the employer, by making such violations unfair labor practices. I was willing to go along with the court action proposal, the so-called suit procedure, as an alternative if conditions became so bad in the relationships between an employer and a union that the employer felt that he could not settle the differences by collective bargaining or by the administrative law procedure of the National Labor Relations Board, through bringing a charge of an unfair labor practice. But I felt that we ought to have both the unfair labor practice procedure and the court suit procedure as alternative procedures.

Mr. President, I believe that the point which I am now making is of vital importance to American employers. I think they ought to have a procedure under which they can go before the Board and point out the violation of a contract, or the refusal of a union to live up to the sanctity of its signature, and have the matter handled through an administrative law process, as an unfair labor practice. We must keep in mind the great difference between the administrative law approach to labor relations problems and the common law court approach. It is surprising how many of these cases wash themselves out, as we say, long before a final decision by an administrative law tribunal. Once the parties are there and have sat down and talked to the administrative law tribunal across the conference or council table, they often see the silliness of their position. They often ask for a recess or temporary postponement until they can go into a conference room and come to a gentleman's understanding for ironing out their difficulties by way of a compromise.

That is a vital procedure which we ought to make available to the parties. I do not like to see substituted for it the procedure of a common-law court approach, because it is going to break down in practice. It will not work. We shall not find employers and unions able to get along very well with each other after one of them has lost a court action in a common-law court, any more than plaintiffs and defendants in other civil actions have very much love for each other after the judge has ruled in favor of either the plaintiff or the defendant. So on this point I think we are making a grievous mistake if we do not make perfectly certain and clear that the employers can approach the question of violations of contracts by unions through the unfair labor practice approach rather than through court action.

To repeat, Mr. President, it is not going to help peaceful relations between management and labor if once a contract is made the employer or the union may thereafter refuse even to discuss the modification of its terms, no matter how unfair or onerous they may have become because of circumstances which were not foreseen when the contract was signed.

My next objection relates to the so-called anti-Communist provisions of the bill.

I must repeat at this point that I am thoroughly convinced that the way the bill handles the problem of communism in labor unions is ineffective and self-defeating. We all know that Communists feed their propaganda and thrive on strikes and industrial warfare. Under the terms of the bill, however, every local union will be denied all access to the peaceful machinery of the act if it has as an officer, or if its parent body has as an officer, a Communist or Communist sympathizer in fact or alleged. We do not help the patriotic membership of unions by requiring them to strike in order to protect the economic rights and benefits which other workers enjoy; and this provision does nothing to help them to purge their unions of Communist leadership. We merely play into the hands of the Communists in these organizations. They will capitalize, by way of their misleading and false propaganda, upon stirred-up tempers and emotions. They will capitalize on delays which I think will become characteristic of the administration of the act.

They will be successful in many instances in getting the workers so aroused because of the unfair operation of the act that they will "pull the plug" so to speak, or "hit the bricks" by way of economic action.

That is not the way to handle communism in American labor unions. A much better way, it seems to me, is to give full protection to legitimate rights of American labor unions, to make clear to them that we are going to hold them responsible for such conditions as I sought to check in Senate bill 858 and the provisions of title I of the Senate bill, but that we are going to give them a continued opportunity to organize and bargain collectively in the interest of their legitimate rights. I fear that the provisions of the bill greatly hamper and injure those rights.

Finally, the bill as it has been amended in conference carries, in my judgment, the very serious vice that it unfairly discriminates against the Board, among all Government agencies, with respect to certain requirements. When we were considering this legislation in the Senate committee and on the floor of the Senate we rejected proposals to single out the board for special treatment. We agreed, I thought, that the procedures prescribed by the recently enacted Administrative Procedure Act, which laid down a code for all agencies, including the Board, should be left intact, at least until they were tried out and found wanting in the special instance of the Board.

It was for these reasons, for example, that we rejected proposals to split the Board into two agencies, or to grant the courts a broader scope of review of Board findings than they had with respect to other agencies. Many amendments adopted in conference, however, completely depart from this sound principle. Without any basis whatever in the record for doing so, they apply and require special procedures as to the Board, different from those required of other agencies under the Administrative Procedure Act.

For example, a separation of functions is now required in the case of the Board which is not required of other agencies. I have dwelt upon this question at some length in a previous complete statement of my views which I made on the floor of the Senate several weeks ago, and I shall not repeat it now, except to refer to it for future reference.

I believe that the provisions of the amended bill, insofar as they create a statutory office of General Counsel, who is to be appointed by the President for a fixed term of years, and confer upon him final authority in respect to investigation and prosecution of charges and issuance of complaints, in effect establish a separation of functions which does not differ in any substantial measure from the kind of separation which we opposed when it appeared in Senate bill 360, the Ball bill. I think it contains all the vices of dispersed authority for administration that impelled the majority of the Attorney General's Committee on Administrative Procedure, the sponsors of the Administrative Procedure Act, and both Houses of Congress, to reject it last year.

Mr. President, it is a tremendous power that has been given to the General Counsel. On page 37 of the conference report we find this language:

> The General Counsel is to have general supervision and direction of all attorneys employed by the Board (excluding the trial examiners and the legal assistants to the individual members of the Board), and of all the officers and employees in the Board's regional offices, and is to have the final authority to act in the name of, but independently of any direction, control, or review by, the Board in respect of the investigation of charges and the issuance of complaints of unfair labor practices, and in respect of the prosecution of such complaints before the Board.

Mr. President, I simply shall never vote to vest in any single individual any such sweeping power over the handling of labor relations cases in this country. I do not know where that superman is to be found. I do not know whom we can appoint or to whom we should entrust the power to determine whether a complaint of an unfair labor practice shall be issued. He becomes really the Board. As I said in the beginning, let me control the procedure of a body and I will control the substantive rights administered by that body. This person would control the procedural rights of every employer and every labor union in the country. Also, when it comes to the question of issuing complaints it can be done independently of the Board. The Board members would sit there and twiddle their thumbs and could not do anything about it, because we, the Congress, propose to vest in the general counsel that power. But not with my vote.

The Procedures Act prescribes an adequate separation of functions for all agencies like the Board, and the Board complies with it. I see absolutely no reason for requiring a more drastic separation than is required of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, or the Securities and Exchange Commission, for example.

We are bringing out a hybrid here, Mr. President, when we pass this monstrosity. I do not know whether it is an administrative agency, a court, or what it is, but it certainly stands as a bird of its own color so far as the Administrative Procedure Act is concerned. It is neither fish nor fowl. I see no reason why an exception should be made to the Administrative Procedure Act in this connection. I see no reason why the rules and regulations laid down in the Seventy-ninth Congress, when we passed the Administrative Procedure Act, should not likewise apply to the National Labor Relations Board. I fought for that viewpoint and was successful in my position in the Senate committee; but now we are confronted with a conference report in which a vital change has been made in this regard. In my judgment, it is a fatal change.

The conference bill also singles out the Board, among the agencies, for special treatment as to subpenas, the rules of evidence, and the promulgation of decisions. The Administrative Procedure Act lays down rules applicable to all agencies uniformly, with respect to these matters. No arguments were advanced during the hearings with respect to the inadequacy of these procedures and I am aware of none. In conference, however, it was agreed that the Board should be bound, so far as practicable, by the conventional rules of evidence prevailing in the courts. This is contrary to the uniform and established rule set forth in the Administrative Procedure Act and embodied in the statutes and rules of other agencies, like the Federal Trade Commission, and including the present

National Labor Relations Act. Virtually all students of the subject, so far as I know, agree that there is no reason for applying conventional, technical rules of evidence in administrative proceedings.

I repeat. I may be wrong; it may be possible to find some authority that advocates it, but I want to say, Mr. President, as one who has taught in this field for many years, that I know of no outstanding American authority in the field of administrative law who advocates that the technical rules of evidence should apply in administrative-law procedure. One of the primary functions of an administrative-law approach to these problems is the desirability of informality, the desirability of speed, the desirability of inaugurating legal short cuts, the desirability of getting quickly into the essence of a case, without being too greatly encumbered by legal technicalities and the rules of evidence. Administrative law procedure does not endanger the legal rights of litigants. It leaves to the courts, as we did in the Senate bill, the power to review, on the basis of substantial evidence applied to the total record, the question as to whether or not justice was done in the case.

As to subpenas, too, under this bill the Board alone, of all agencies, is required to issue all subpenas forthwith upon the mere request of any party and without any showing of materiality or relevancy. We must watch out for "fishing expeditions," Mr. President, in the matter of subpenas. We must guard against subpena abuses. It is perfectly proper and desirable, may I say, that the rule of relevancy and materiality be applied. But as I read the conference report bill, subpenas must now be issued forthwith, so far as the National Labor Relations Board is concerned, and no requirement of materiality or relevancy is to be laid down.

Under the Administrative Procedure Act, all other agencies may protect their subpena process from abuse by insisting upon a simple statement of relevancy. Not so the Board; although here, again, so far as I know, we have heard no complaint whatever that the Administrative Procedure Act's uniform requirements were inadequate or that the Board does not comply with them.

The Administrative Procedure Act also contains details of value as to the form of decision and the decision-making process. I know of no complaint that they are inadequate for any reason. Particularly I know of no complaint that they are inadequate with respect to the Board. Nevertheless the conference bill prescribes special treatment for the Board in this respect also. It provides, in substance, that if no exceptions are filed within 20 days after service of the trial examiner's proposed report and recommended order, "such recommended order shall become the order of the Board and become effective as therein prescribed." This means that, in effect, the doctrine of exhaustion of remedies is suspended in the single instance of the National Labor Relations Board. A dissatisfied litigant before the Board is permitted to side-step the Board and to resort directly to the courts. He need not raise by exceptions to the Board matters as to which he objected and lost before the trial examiner. Instead, he may compel the Board to defend a decision it has not made, or be reversed as to rulings which, if error had been called to the Board's attention by appropriate appeal, the Board might have itself corrected.

So, Mr. President, it is only a matter of fair dealing that the Board ought to be allowed that protection. A board frequently, on the basis of notice of appeal by a party litigant, corrects its record, reverses itself, or orders a new hearing. I do not think that parties litigant in Board cases should be allowed to sidestep the Board, which this amendment permits, and to go directly into the courts without first giving the Board an opportunity to perfect its own decision or to reverse itself.

I think there is no more effective way of justifying the suspicions sometimes voiced against the Republican majority, that it is antilabor, and of discrediting this legislation and the Board in the eyes of fair-minded people, than by discriminatory legislation such as these provisions constitute. I say that we cannot afford to single out in these unjustifiable ways and remove from the general law and scheme of procedures applicable to all other agencies, the one agency which deals with and is intended to protect the basic rights of labor to self-organization and collective bargaining.

While I am on this phase of the subject, I think I should add that we expose ourselves to the same charge of bias and discrimination against labor, by our treatment in the conference amendments of the question of the union shop and State regulation of labor relations. Thus, we lay down in the bill a very full and complete national policy as to closed- and union-shop agreements. At the same time, the bill provides in section 13 (b), however, that the national policy may be entirely disregarded and superseded by the States if they desire to impose a more restrictive policy on the same subject matter. A more pointed instance of antilabor bias could hardly be envisaged than this alleged minor change in the bill.

Mr. President, we are dealing under a national policy with interstate commerce. The jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board is limited to interstate commerce cases and issues. But this amendment proposes that we except from the national policy, as it relates to interstate commerce, national jurisdiction over these matters as they involve the closed shops and union shops, in the case of any State which passes an anti-closed shop or antiunion shop bill. The bill provides in effect that we allow to employers in those States a State policy over interstate commerce contrary to a national policy that we would apply through the National Labor Relations Board in all other States which do not enact such State legislation.

Mr. President, if anyone knows of a better example of unfair discrimination than that, I should like to hear about it. I say that when it comes to interstate-commerce policies, they should be uniform throughout the Nation, and we should not have a national policy in regard to closed shops and union shops in States X, Y, and Z, but then permit of a policy quite contrary to that policy under State laws in States A, B, and C. Many employers will not like that, either, Mr. President, because that has some interesting competitive implications connected with it, too. It will be rather interesting, if this measure becomes law, to hear from some employers who, when bound by the national policy, will come forward with allegations, and, I think, in due course of time will prove, that such discriminatory practices result in some unfair competitive factors for them in their competition with competitors in other States who are able to function under a different policy.

I say that because if we give that right to the States that are enacting legislation, much of which, according to my view, is highly antilabor and unfair to the legitimate rights of labor, we shall find the economic status of labor in those States gradually beaten down. The results of such discriminatory policies will affect wage scales and will play into the hands of employers who want cheaper and cheaper labor. Unorganized labor means cheap labor. It means low wages. Weak unions mean the same. Then State antilabor laws will return labor to the status of a commodity. Soon employers who are bound by the national policy as applied by the National Labor Relations Board will find themselves at a competitive disadvantage with employers operating in antilabor States which give to their employees the competitive advantage of antiunion-shop legislation with its resulting low wages and cheap labor. Such a situation will result in nothing else but strife, friction, and increased labor trouble.

So, Mr. President, on this point I say that the editorial entitled "Right to Work," appearing in today's Washington Post, very aptly illustrates the point that the public is not aware of the real provisions of this bill. The editorial reads in part as follows:

> It is true that the closed shop, as it has been known in the past, would be outlawed as an instrument of inexcusable monopoly. More significant, however, is the fact that something better would be put in its place. Workers could have a union shop at any time simply by getting 30 percent of their number to sign a petition requesting an election on the subject and then commanding a majority of the votes at the election. Certainly that involves no hardship.

The writer of the editorial then says, in all of his innocence:

> On the contrary, it gives the rank and file of workingmen a chance to make their own choice instead of having a union shop thrust upon them.

Mr. President, the plain implication is that the bill guarantees workers a union shop if a majority so vote. Nothing is said, however, about the provision of the bill to which I have just referred, which completely outlaws any form of the union shop in those States that have enacted laws abolishing or making illegal all forms of union security. More than a dozen States have such laws on their books at the present time. I repeat, therefore, Mr. President, that it is completely misleading to imply, as does the Post editorial, in common with others, that under the conference report workers can have the union shop if they so desire.

Furthermore, Mr. President, the union shop will only be the subject of collective bargaining. The workers will not receive it as a matter of automatic right. They may have to strike for it, in cases in which the employer refuses to give it to them.

Mr. President, this conference report is a far cry even from the Senate bill. It is unfair, it is destructive of legitimate labor rights, and administratively it is unworkable. I think it will cause, rather than prevent, labor disputes. It must, and I believe it will, be opposed by the working people of America. I think it makes a disastrous contribution to the Nation's economic health and well-being.

In closing, Mr. President, I wish to comment very briefly on two additional points. I, too, deeply regret that those who wrote the conference report saw fit to change the Senate bill which provided for a board of seven members, rather than a board of three members. The conference report now proposes the creation of a board of five members. That will create more delay. In the committee I fought for, and was successful in, having the board enlarged to seven members, because with the additional jurisdiction and duties and functions which have been added to the National Labor Relations Board by this measure, a much larger board than five is needed. In fact, I think even seven members might be considered insufficient; but at least a seven-man board would permit the Board to function as is provided for in my section of the bill on a departmentalized basis of three members per department, leaving one member of the Board—probably in most instances the chairman—free to carry on much of the administrative work of the Board. But with a five-man board, there cannot be two departments, composed of three members each, sitting at one and the same time over the weeks that I think they ought to sit if they are going to keep the Board's docket reasonably up to date.

So I think it is very important that we have a seven-man board, rather than a five-man board, because I wish to see two departments, composed of three men each, sitting day after day and week after week in the hearings held by the board, in order to keep the board up to date in respect to its docket. Here is another change which plays into the hands of delay and enhances the unworkability of the bill.

Mr. President, I close with a quotation from a War Labor Board decision which was written by the distinguished president of the University of North Carolina, Dr. Frank Graham, who was one of the public members of the Board. I think his decision is a great piece of writing in its literary sense, and I think it is an even greater piece of writing from the standpoint of the great truths which are expressed in it concerning the importance of maintaining employer-employee relations on a stable basis if democracy itself is to survive in the United States.

So I close with this quotation, Mr. President, in support of my feeling that we are now being asked to vote for a piece of legislation which I think will be most destructive for many years to come, if it becomes law, of stable labor relations in the United States. I think this piece of legislation will have sweeping economic, social, and political consequences in the United States during the next decade. I think this piece of legislation leaves to free workers in the United States no other course than to dig in along a united front for as long as is necessary in a united effort to see to it that the wrongs done by this legislation are eradicated as rapidly as possible by wiping the legislation off the statute books as soon as a new Congress can be elected to do that job. That may take several years, but sooner or later this fight must be won at the ballot box.

Mr. President, I think we can well ponder what Frank Graham said in the Little Steel case, when he paid his great tribute to corporations, unions, churches, and parliamentary bodies in these words:

> High on Hitler's list of the institutions of democracy early marked for the destruction necessary to clear the way for the rise of the Nazi dictatorship were and are the church, the parliament, the corporation, and the labor union. These four institutions are the focal motive force of the four main chapters in the rise of human freedom. The freedom of human beings to organize in autonomous groups has been won through long struggles in the fields of religion, politics, business, and labor.
> The power of the great Roman Empire struck down the unrecognized and despised organizations of early Christians, but the little congregations of lowly believers became the Church Universal, which transformed the sackable city of Rome into the unsackable City of God, transmitted the ancient learning, resynthesized Western culture, built the cathedrals, founded the universities, and despite all its faults and failures, with its Hebraic-Christian conception of the brothers of men and the sons of God, has been for the longest period the most beneficent organization in history. The church, in its turn of predominance, tried to block the rise to absolute power of the new autonomous nations within the ecclesiastical dominion. Then the new absolute national monarchies, having become entrenched in independent power, sought to check the rise to increasing power of the autonomous organization of the people's representatives in Parliament. Yet Parliament won its struggle for collective bargaining with the King, and their written agreement became the English Bill of Rights, which, since 1689, has been the charter of constitutional government for all nations which have followed the traditions of the English-speaking peoples.
> It is historically logical that the democratic idea of autonomous organization, which achieved victories in the fields of religion and politics, should become an issue in the fields of commerce and industry. The commercial and industrial revolutions created successively the commercial and industrial middle classes, which, through autonomous corporations, soon established their dominant positions in modern society. The corporations helped to overthrow feudal serfdom and gathered the savings of people anywhere in the service of people everywhere. The English Parliament having become a stronghold of the commercial and industrial leaders, and an instrument of corporate power, prohibited workingmen from organizing in behalf of better conditions of life and labor. The struggle of industrial workers to organize and win the reluctant recognition of legislative bodies, the courts, and the corporations is the latest chapter in the democratic struggle of human beings for autonomous organization around a great human need. The movement of working people against heavy odds to win a simple share in the control of their own lives is one of the great human movements of the last hundred years and is at the center of the struggle for freedom and democracy in our time.
> The freedom and independence of the labor union is of the essence of historic Americanism. The little band of religious Pilgrims who, in seeking the right to organize for the worship of God without the consent of king or bishop, after many vicissitudes in a foreign land and across uncharted seas still clinging to their principles of piety and autonomous religious organization, fetched up on the wintry shores of Massachusetts where their spiritual heroism made Plymouth Rock one of the foundation stones of self-government in America. One year before the Pilgrims reached American shores, Sir Edwin Sandys led a movement in the London company to recognize the self-organization of the settlers in Virginia. The less farsighted businessmen said it would ruin the business enterprise to give these workingmen the right to share in the regulation of their conditions of life and labor. But the intelligent idealism of Sir Edwin Sandys prevailed over the fears of the more practical-minded businessmen. Thus was born the first representative assembly in the New World. The democratic idea of autonomous political organization, later federated in the American Union, whose American standard was first raised on the banks of the James River in old Virginia, still flies its flag high in all the western world. The freedom and security of the right of all human beings to organize in churches, legislatures, corporations, and labor unions is part of the basic meaning of our American freedom and is at the heart of what the war is all about. Hitler is out to destroy the freedom of America and the free basic institutions of democracy everywhere. The struggle over the freedom and security of the union is, therefore, one of the latest episodes in the American chapter of the rise of democracy in the modern world, and is at the very center of the global struggle between the United Nations and the Axis Powers.

I close, Mr. President, by saying that it is my honest and sincere judgment that the enactment of the conference report bill will do great injury to the right of American workingmen to organize and bargain collectively effectively. The right to organize, unless the procedural guarantees are present that make it possible for the organization to consummate in effective action, is, of course, only an empty right.

Thus I shall vote against the conference report, and I shall vote to sustain a veto, if a veto shall be handed down on the bill because I believe that by so doing I am voting for the long-time best economic interests not only of workers, but of employers, businessmen, farmers, consumers, Americans all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the conference report on H. R. 3020.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JUNE 5, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou all-wise God, infinite in truth and love, Thou knowest our frame and rememberest that we are dust. Out of the holy silence where Thou dwellest, we hear Thy voice and we are sheltered in the folds of Thy fatherly care; glory be unto Thy holy name.

We pray Thee to lift the curtain from our nearest duty and allow nothing to enfeeble our spirit or retard our effort to seek the light and follow its gleam. So fashion our daily demeanor that we shall be most helpful examples to our fellow men, and that they shall be made solemnly aware of their obligation to our country. O make us upright in all our dealings that we may bear no marring defects of character. Do Thou inspire us with a life animated by the kindly thought of all men, and sometime, somewhere, someway, they will rise up and call our name blessed.

In our Saviour's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ment," for the disposition of executive papers in the following departments and agencies:

5. Department of the Treasury.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CURTIS asked and was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution.

EXEMPTION FROM ADMISSIONS TAX OF GENERAL ADMISSIONS TO AGRICULTURAL FAIRS

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 3602) to exempt from admissions tax general admissions to agricultural fairs.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED]?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and it is not my intention to do so, I employ this method of securing recognition simply to state that this bill was unanimously reported favorably by the Committee on Ways and Means. It has for its purpose the exemption from the admissions tax on the outside admissions to agricultural fairs. We strongly favor its enactment.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is for educational purposes as far as agriculture is concerned, is it not?

Mr. REED of New York. Absolutely. There are 2,200 county fairs in the United States. I know of no institution that is more educational as far as the farmer is concerned than the county fairs. The farmers come there with their families, the 4–H Clubs, the Future Farmers of America. They bring their livestock and poultry and things pertaining to the farm.

The Grange brings in its exhibits. They are shown in the floral hall. They charge no admission at all, but the exhibitors with their families are obliged to pay at the outer gate for the privilege of coming in and taking charge of their own exhibits.

Mr. RICH. Suppose someone wanted to put on a movie show for the entertainment of the people, would admission charges to the movie be exempt?

Mr. REED of New York. It does not exempt any of the inside entertainments or concessions. This applies only to the general admission at the gate.

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. SCRIVNER. Does this also include exemption for admission to State fairs as well as county fairs?

Mr. REED of New York. It does.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subchapter A of chapter 10 of the Internal Revenue Code (tax on admissions and dues) is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 1705. Exemption of Agricultural Fairs.

"Notwithstanding the provisions of section 541 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1941 (terminating certain exemptions from admissions tax) or any other provision of law, no tax shall be levied under this subchapter in respect of any admissions to agricultural fairs if no part of the net earnings thereof inures to the benefit of any stockholders or members of the association conducting the same, and if the proceeds therefrom are used exclusively for the improvement, maintenance, and operation of such agricultural fairs or for the purpose of education and promotion in the interests of agriculture, horticulture, domestic science, the Future Farmers of America, and 4–H Club activities."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

POWERS OF APPOINTMENT, CERTAIN DISCRETIONARY TRUSTS, AND DISCHARGE OF INDEBTEDNESS

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 210, to extend the time for the release, free of estate and gift tax, of certain powers, and for other purposes, and for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 403 (d) (3) of the Revenue Act of 1942 (relating to the release of certain powers of appointment) is hereby amended by striking out "July 1, 1947" wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "July 1, 1948"; and section 452 (c) of the Revenue Act of 1942 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(c) Release before July 1, 1948:

"(1) A release of a power to appoint before July 1, 1948, shall not be deemed a transfer of property by the individual possessing such power.

"(2) This subsection shall apply to all calendar years prior to 1948 and to that part of the calendar year 1948 prior to July 1, 1948."

SEC. 2. (a) Section 1000 (e) of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to certain discretionary trusts) is hereby amended by striking out "prior to January 1, 1945," and inserting in lieu thereof "on or before December 31, 1947 (or on a later date in any case where it is shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner, in accordance with regulations prescribed by him with the approval of the Secretary, that failure to relinquish prior to such later date was for reasonable cause)."

(b) If any amount paid prior to the date of the enactment of this joint resolution constitutes an overpayment of gift tax solely by reason of the amendment made by this section, no interest shall be allowed or paid with respect to the amount of such overpayment.

SEC. 3. The last sentence of section 22 (b) (9) and the last sentence of section 22 (b) (10) of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to exclusion of income from discharge of indebtedness) are hereby amended by striking out "1947" and inserting in lieu thereof "1949."

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, this joint resolution extends to July 1, 1948, the period for releasing certain powers of appointment without incurring liability for estate or gift taxes.

The Revenue Act of 1942 made a number of significant changes in the law dealing with powers of appointment which affected holders of preexisting powers, among which there were many fiduciaries.

To determine whether these powers, even though not exercised, were subject to the estate or gift tax, required a thorough investigation of many trust instruments and wills and involved complicated questions of interpretation of State and local law.

In order to enable holders of these powers to adjust their affairs in the light of new legislation, Congress provided in the Revenue Act of 1942 that such powers could be released prior to January 1, 1945, if the power was created on or before October 21, 1942. Subsequent amendments have extended this date to July 1, 1947. It is now proposed to extend the time to July 1, 1948, so that the matter may be considered in connection with the general revenue bill, to be taken up next year.

The distinction usually made between a general and a special power lies in the circumstances that, under the former, the donee may appoint to anyone, including his own estate or his creditors, thus having the full dominion over the property as if he owned it; whereas, under the latter, the donee may appoint only amongst a restricted or designated class of persons other than himself.

This bill, House Joint Resolution 210, extends the applicable period of paragraphs (9) and (10) of section 22 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code for 2 years, that is, to the end of the calendar year 1947.

Those provisions enable corporations to exclude from their gross income amounts attributable to the discharge of indebtedness at less than face value.

Paragraph (9) of the section applies to corporations generally; paragraph (10), to railroad corporations in receivership or reorganization proceedings.

For corporations generally—those covered by section 22 (b) (9)—the exclusion is elective and is conditioned upon the taxpayers' consent to a corresponding reduction in the basis of property held by it at any time during the taxable year in which the discharge occurred. The reduction is made under regulations conforming with the general standards laid down in section 113 (b) (3) of the Internal Revenue Code. The application of paragraph (9) is limited to secured indebtedness, either of the taxpayer corporation or of another corporation if the taxpayer is liable for it.

For railroad corporations in receivership or reorganization proceedings, the provisions of paragraph (10) apply. These provisions differ somewhat from those of paragraph (9). In the first place, paragraph (10) applies to any indebtedness, whether or not evidenced by a security. Secondly, the exclusion of income realized from a modification in or cancellation of indebtedness, is not left to the election of the taxpayer. Finally, there is no provision for a compensating reduction in the basis of property held by the railroad corporation whose indebtedness is modified or canceled. In lieu of such a provision, section 112 (b) (9) prohibits the recognition of loss on the transfer of property to a railroad corporation in a receivership or reorganization proceeding, and section 113 (a) (20) provides that property so transferred shall have the same basis in the hands of the acquiring corporation as in the hands of the corporation whose property was so acquired.

The history of section 22 (b) (9) and (10) is interesting. Both paragraphs have their origin in paragraph (9), which was added to the code by the Revenue Act of 1939. The purpose of this addition, as stated in the committee report, was to enable debt-ridden railroads—though there was no express limitation to railroads—to repurchase their own bonds at a discount without subjecting themselves to a prohibitive tax penalty. The privilege, however, was expressly restricted to corporations in an unsound financial condition when the debt was discharged. The amendment was applicable to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1938, but not to any discharge of indebtedness occurring before the date of the enactment of the Revenue Act of 1939—June 29, 1939—or in a taxable year beginning in 1943 or later.

The Revenue Act of 1942 eliminated the unsatisfactory requirement of unsound financial condition and added the new paragraph (10) for the special coverage of railroad corporations in reorganization or receivership proceedings.

Section 22 (b) (9), as amended, was made applicable only to taxable years begining in 1942, 1943, 1944, or 1945. The new section 22 (b) (10) was made applicable to taxable years beginning in 1940 or later.

Neither paragraph (9) nor (10), however, applied to any discharge of indebtedness occurring in a taxable year beginning after December 31, 1945.

The present bill will extend for a further period of 2 years these desirable provisions of internal revenue law.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GOFF asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an address by the Under Secretary of War at an Idaho commencement.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD the last broadcast by our late colleague Fred Bradley, of Michigan, on the Panama Canal; and also to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Long Beach Press-Telegram of May 22, 1947.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a letter on soil conservation.

Mr. LARCADE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

Mr. LYNCH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in two instances and include an editorial and a letter.

BROOKLYN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, comparative peace is the world order of the day—but a holy peace pervades the Borough of Brooklyn in New York.

For there, today, we celebrate the one hundred and eighteenth anniversary of the founding of the Brooklyn Sunday School Union, marked by the annual anniversary-day parade. In the lines of march, all over the borough, will be upward of 150,000 men, women, and children of all Protestant denominations, proudly and publicly professing their faith in God. They will be reviewed by the Governor of the State of New York, the mayor of the city of New York, the president of the Borough of Brooklyn, and national dignitaries of church and state.

The event is uniquely Brooklyn and has no counterpart anywhere in the world—beautiful floats depict holy scenes; colorful banners convey messages of good will and of peace—and patriotic Americans show their devotion to God. All of Brooklyn joins in this holiday of holiness—inspired by the zeal of their neighbors. Were the world in Brooklyn today, a comparative peace would become absolute and permanent. The lights would shine brightly and forever.

LABOR LEGISLATION

Mr. COMBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. COMBS. Mr. Speaker, labor legislation passed by the House yesterday contains no provision to enable the President to deal with shut-downs in the coal mining industry, no provision empowering him to deal with John L. Lewis, and serves only to cripple little local unions by so weakening their control over selection and discipline of their membership as to make them the easy victims of Communist infiltration.

As soon as the American people and Members of Congress have had a chance to study and understand the conference labor bill voted yesterday, it will become abundantly clear that Congress has completely failed to give the American people the sound labor legislation they desire for curbing Nation-crippling strikes.

The bill purports to deal with national emergencies which threaten the national health and safety, but a John L. Lewis coal mine walk-out which might put the Nation in dire peril, is not one of the emergencies dealt with. Let us examine that part of the bill which ostensibly deals with emergency strikes:

Would the bill empower the President properly to deal with a shutting down of the coal mines in the manner that has occurred several times recently?

The answer, definitely, is "No." There is not a single provision, not even a word in the bill which, even by implication, would empower the President to deal with such a situation. Just what does the bill authorize the President to do in the case of national emergency?

Section 26, page 54, line 16 provides:

> Whenever, in the opinion of the President of the United States, a threatened or actual strike or lock-out affecting an entire industry, or a substantial part thereof • • • will, if permitted to occur or to continue, will imperil the national health or safety—

And so forth—

> he may appoint a board of inquiry—

And proceed by injunction, and so forth, under the machinery specified.

Now, this empowers the President to deal with industry-wide strikes, actual or threatened. What is a strike? The bill does not define the term. But, since the proceedings authorized are applicable only to unions and their agents, it may be assumed that the strike the President is authorized to deal with is one which either is authorized by the union or its officials acting for it, or which is ratified and officially sanctioned by the union or its agents.

Now, how do the coal-mining stoppages occur? It is very simple. There is no strike vote by the membership, and no order to strike need be given by President John L. Lewis or anyone else. The contract simply expires, usually in the dead of winter when coal is desperately needed. The coal miners say "We work only under contract. No contract, no work." They simply stay at home or go on a vacation. They do not picket the mines and although it is obviously a concerted action, each miner acts as an individual.

And, if such a work stoppage could be called a "strike" within the meaning of the bill, whom would the President proceed against? Whom could the court enjoin? From what would the court enjoin the person or persons proceeded against?

The President and the courts could not proceed against the mine officials since they will have neither authorized nor directed the work stoppage; in fact, the stoppage might not be complete, but only a slow-down by mass absenteeism. It would be found, also, that the mine union officials had no legal authority to order the miners to go back to work. How, then, could they be held liable for failing to do what they had no legal right or obligation to do, or to desist as officials from doing something they had not done? Could the 500,000 members be enjoined? Of course not. Neither the President nor the courts could proceed against individual miners. In the first place, the bill authorizes no such procedure. Furthermore, no such thing could be validly authorized for the simple reason that so long as we have a Constitution and a bill of rights left in this country, the citizen cannot be compelled to work for a private employer against his will.

It should be noted that the President was enabled to deal with the recent coal strike by proceeding against the mine union president and the mine union only because the mines were in the hands of the Goverment under seizure, and he acted under the Smith-Connally Act and for the enforcement of an agreement between the Government and the union. So, the President not only had the broad powers of emergency law, but also what was held to be a contract with the union against such stoppages.

The pending bill offers absolutely nothing to empower the President to deal with a peacetime situation arising under private control in a coal-mine industry where the technique has been developed of "no contract, no work." Thus, what is in some respects the most menacing and dangerous of all possible industry-wide shut-downs is left a clear road for full operation. Strikes called by vote of the membership, as in the case of a great public utility, and which endanger the public health and safety, could be dealt with under terms of the bill. The coal miners' "no contract, no work" shutting down of the mines would find the President powerless to do anything about it.

The Smith-Connally Act under which the President acted in dealing with Lewis will expire June 30. Lewis has made no contract with the mine owners and the press reports "no progress toward a contract." Apparently he is getting ready for another "no contract, no work" shutdown whenever he deems the time most appropriate to suit his purposes. Thus, John L. Lewis, who has repeatedly all but brought this Nation to its knees in the dead of winter—John L. Lewis, who has repeatedly defied his Government—John L. Lewis, who has denounced the courts of his country, will, under this bill, be perfectly free to go his merry way. Our President, as far as anything in this bill is concerned, will be utterly helpless to deal with him. Yes, the bill curbs jurisdictional strikes, secondary boycotts, and other practices of little unions. But there are no jurisdictional strikes, no boycotts in the mine unions. It is all one show run by one man who, as far as this bill is concerned, will be free to do as he pleases.

Thus, this Republican-controlled Congress, resting under the solemn obligation to give the American people a sound and workable law to curb such practices, has denied the hopes of the people and failed even to protect them from the most menacing of all strikes and the most powerful and ruthless of all labor leaders.

No wonder John L. Lewis has been strangely silent while other labor leaders denounced the bill. It could not better serve his purposes if he had written it himself.

AMERICAN LEGION SPEAKS ON IMMIGRATION—ADDRESS OF NATIONAL COMMANDER

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks and include a letter from the Director of the national legislative committee of the American Legion, a resolution by the American Legion, and also an address by the commander of the American Legion before the Daughters of the American Revolution on the subject of immigration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, there is an effort being made under the guise of serving displaced persons, to tear down our immigration laws and to flood this country with aliens, many of whom will bring with them communism, atheism, anarchy, and infidelity.

When former Ambassador Bullitt was testifying before the Committee on Un-American Activities he said that 60 percent of the Communists in this country are immigrants.

Mr. Speaker, the Communists are dedicated to the overthrow of this Government, they are dedicated to the destruction of the American way of life, they are dedicated to the destruction of Christianity throughout the world.

It is the greatest menace civilization has faced in 2,000 years.

I join with the American Legion, I join with the Daughters of the American Revolution, who have been attacked by honest Harold Ickes for standing up for their country—I join with them in opposition to legislation that would tear down the bars of immigration to the enemies that are coming here to stir up trouble from one end of this country to the other.

Mr. Speaker, as a part of my remarks I include the following:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Washington, D. C., May 28, 1947.

Hon. JOHN E. RANKIN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Hearings on the Stratton bill, H. R. 2910, which proposes changes in our present immigration laws "to permit displaced persons in Germany, Austria, and Italy, including relatives of citizens or members of our armed forces to be admitted to the United States" will commence before the House Judiciary Committee on June 4.

Enclosed find two resolutions adopted by the American Legion dealing with this subject. The American Legion is opposed to any such changes in our immigration laws, and I quote you a resolution adopted at our Chicago 1945 national convention, as follows:

"Resolved, That article 75 of the Geneva Convention which calls for the return of prisoners of war to their own countries be strictly enforced and that no exceptions be made by permitting them to remain in the United States or otherwise facilitating their readmission.

"Postwar immigration will receive the very earnest attention of the Congress during the current session. In fact, a special subcommittee of the Congress has been engaged since early summer in a survey not only on the broad subject of immigration but also on deportation and naturalization legislation. Already available reports of their meetings indicate a coalition of various types of organizations and minority groups whose particular functions appear to be the alleviation of the conditions of alleged oppressed persons and groups, and of assisting the aliens within the deportable classes to avoid deportation, and in aiding and abetting the naturalization of aliens generally. Their primary interest is the aliens rather than the general welfare of their country."

Attached also find a copy of the speech made by National Commander Paul H. Griffith before the DAR May 22, 1947.

I am sending this material to you in order that you might have at hand the position of the American Legion on this very vital subject.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN THOMAS TAYLOR,
Director, National Legislative Committee.

RESOLUTION 270

(Chicago national convention, September 18–20, 1944, p. 65, Americanism committee)

PROHIBIT IMMIGRATION TILL ALL VETERANS OBTAIN EMPLOYMENT

Whereas the American Legion is strongly committed to the principles that American citizens should at all times be afforded the opportunity for immediate gainful employment: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That to this end we advocate and strongly urge:

1. That any foreign-born resident who avoided the obligations of military service or who hereafter fail to make application for first papers within 3 years from the date of his entry into this country shall be automatically subject to deportation.

2. That all immigration be barred from the United States from the date of cessation of hostilities of the present war until such time as—

(a) Unemployment in this country shall be dropped to less than 1,000,000.

(b) All veterans shall have been afforded the opportunity of gainful employment.

(c) All so-called members of imported foreign labor battalions, refugees, war prisoners, and/or those who have been given temporary sanctuary, employment, or haven during the present state of war shall have been returned to the lands of their origin, which the Legion believes should be accomplished without delay; and be it further

Resolved, That the American Legion, however, does not favor the barring of foreign-born wives, husbands, and children of American members of the armed forces and of the war establishment who may prefer to reside and work in this country.

(San Francisco national convention, September 30–October 4, 1946, p. 113, Americanism committee)

RESTRICT ALL QUOTA IMMIGRATION

Whereas our country is faced with a most critical housing shortage and hundreds of thousands of our war veterans are unable to secure homes, and the fact that serious unemployment is possible in the not distant future: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American Legion in annual national convention assembled in San Francisco, Calif., September 30 to October 4, 1946, That it requests the President of the United States to suspend by Executive order and/or the Congress of the United States by appropriate legislation to restrict all quota immigration on the basis of the National Origins Act as well as displaced refugee immigration until January 1, 1948.

ADDRESS OF NATIONAL COMMANDER PAUL H. GRIFFITH, OF THE AMERICAN LEGION, BEFORE THE FIFTY-SIXTH CONGRESS OF THE DAR IN WASHINGTON, D. C., MAY 22, 1947

As national commander of the American Legion, the world's largest veteran's organization, I am happy to bring greetings to this DAR Congress from more than 3,500,000 defenders of America in two world wars.

The American Legion and the DAR have a powerful bond in common. They are both 100-percent American organizations. Love of country is our common business. The perils of our Nation are our common concern.

Between two such thoroughly patriotic groups utmost frankness is always in order in a common approach to any pressing national problem. We have such a problem before us here today in immigration. We have never pulled our punches in the past in facing important issues. We will not pull any punches today.

I am not going to discuss immigration in an academic manner here today. I am going to attack it as a growing menace to America.

Immigration in 1947 has run amuck.

It has become a lawless torrent that is undermining the very foundations of our American way of life.

It is robbing the returned veteran of his opportunities.

It is building up a fifth column in this country that may well be the margin by which we may meet with disaster in the next war.

Let's get down to some grim facts. Let's look at the realities of our immigration problem today and close our ears to the sob stuff with which we are being beguiled.

Legal immigrants are entering this country at a rate of 154,000 a year. That amounts to about 425 foreigners a day admitted lawfully.

But for every legal immigrant for whom Richard opens the door to America, there are at least 10 illegal immigrants—black-market immigrants—if you please. They belong to the sneak-into-America 1947 world club.

Every day thousands of foreigners run our borders or skip our laws in illegal entries into the United States. Nobody knows what the actual score is. Whatever it is, it is fantastic.

The present immigration flow—a trickle of legal entries and a flood of illegal ones—has made the United States a laughing stock of the world. The greatest international sport today is running the American immigration laws under false colors. It's a game in which the foreigners can't lose because the umpires are asleep, the fans are too busy filling themselves with peanuts and soda pop, and the players make their own rules.

The skullduggery that is going on under our existing immigration laws is simply beyond belief.

Seamen, many of them that only in name, are jumping ships in American ports.

Foreigners arriving in transit on the way to other lands make it a permanent "sit" in the good old United States of America.

Aliens dropping in on visitors' visas manage to get lost in our wide open spaces.

Overseas students come here to study and make it life jobs.

Outlanders from the four corners of the earth run our borders daily along the Canadian and Mexican boundaries and over the Caribbean waters, making a mockery of our meager patrols.

All these foreigners are thumbing their noses at our laws. They know that Americans always have been indulgent and generous and easy marks for heart appeals. So every foreigner who violates our immigration laws figures he has an ace in the hole.

That ace is the reluctance of the American people generally to separate families.

If and when, as occasionally happens, a foreigner who has entered this country illegally or overstayed his leave or "crooked" his way into America in some way or other, is apprehended, that alien's first move is to get married—if he isn't already. Then his case immediately becomes a "hardship case." That means it would involve a hardship on members of his family to separate the family group. Special interest groups and misguided organizations and individuals will set up a clamor for fair treatment of such hardship cases, meaning by that the legalization of the status of such foreigners.

Let us put this typical 1947 illegal immigrant under a magnifying glass. He is a black-market immigrant—a law violator. He cannot hope to become a citizen of the United States unless he adds perjury to his immigration law breaking, for he dares never to tell the truth about how he got into the country. He is thus foreordained to being a noncitizen and a nonvoter unless he practices more fraud. At the best he is thus not a likely good citizenship asset.

This immigrant—let's not fool ourselves—did not break our laws, practice deceit and fraud on our authorities and cover himself with lies just to enter America to help make it a better country. No. He sneaked into America for what he could get out of it, for what he could despoil it of—not only in material assets but in its spiritual wealth as well. For he didn't come here as a candidate for conversion to Americanism. He came here, the odds are, as a missionary and evangelist of foreign philosophies of life and government.

It is a far cry from the present type of immigrants to the sturdy stock who came here as pioneers. These earlier immigrants were men and women who came here openly and lawfully, to become citizens, to accept our ideal, and to help build this Nation with hard work and thrift. We proudly declare these were our ancestors. They were an asset in the wresting of an empire out of a wilderness.

Today the wilderness is conquered. The empire has been built. It needs believers in it who will maintain it, preserve it, strengthen it, and defend it.

The illegal immigration flow, the black-market immigrants, is a Godsend to communism in the United States. With thousands of foreigners illegally leaping our immigration barriers every day with the greatest of ease, imagine how many Communists, Bolshevists, unrepentant Nazis and Fascists, and peddlers of other foreigns isms, are infiltrating into the American scene.

Gerhart Eisler, alias Hans Berger, the No. 1 Communist in the United States today, whom the Government is now trying to punish and deport for breaking our laws and practicing fraud upon us, is a product of the present immigration flow, legal and illegal.

We have in this country today still at large a band of Communist atomic spies whose names were disclosed to our Government by Prime Minister Mackenzie King, of Canada, more than 20 months ago. These Red secret agents have not been arrested, have not been tried, and for all I know have not even been hampered in their plotting against the security and welfare of this Nation, although their identities now have been known to Government officials since September 1945. To what group do these enemy operators in the United States look to for aid and support? The answer is obvious—to our enormous black-market immigrant group.

The American people have been led to believe that our present quota immigration laws are selective. Nothing could be further from the truth. The fact is that while we specify the country of origin from which immigrants may come to the United States, we do little or nothing to certify that those who do come are capable and desirous of embracing our American way of life.

This condition bids fair to become America's Trojan horse of the twentieth century. If allowed to persist, it will destroy the very base of our living standards.

To avert this catastrophe, the American Legion believes that our immigration laws should be selective in fact as well as in name. We call for selection not only by nation but by person, so that only those who measure up to America's freedoms and responsibilities will sift through to America's shores.

I have shown you the moral and the political reasons why the American Legion in the interest of future good citizenship is demanding drastic tightening of our immigration laws.

There are impelling economic reasons also why immigration should be suspended immediately for at least a year. These reasons involve a national obligation to America's veterans.

The American Legion does not want the doors opened wider because it believes that the rights of American—first of all veterans—come first and come ahead of any claims of foreigners.

Department of Labor figures showed 2,330,000 Americans were out of work and looking for jobs on March 31 this year. Of these, 850,000 were veterans.

There are today possibly as many as 3,500,000 of our people who are half-housed, ill-housed, or actually unhoused. Again the veteran is in the unfortunate majority. Every large newspaper in the United States is carrying daily agony columns of veterans seeking any kind of a shelter.

Our industry has not yet hit its reconversion stride. Consumer goods remain scarce and inferior and some still are rationed. Inflation is here, with a vicious cycle of rising prices and costs making shortages more acute.

Our economic experts predict that the unemployment situation is going to be worse before it gets better. Our housing experts say it will be years before the shortage of homes is remedied.

Immigration means competition for American veterans and other citizens for jobs, housing, and consumer goods.

Every foreigner in the United States, whether here legally or illegally, is a veteran's immediate rival for a job, for an apartment, for a house, for a suit of clothes, for a hard-to-get new automobile.

The foreigner's presence in the American labor market, his bid for housing, and his use of consumer goods represent a discrimination against the veteran who needs a job, a home, a car, and a suit because he gave them all up to fight for America. The veterans now should have first priority on these necessities of personal reconversion. To give these "musts" to an alien is a slap in the face for the veteran who believed enough in America to risk his life in her defense and is entitled to first consideration.

And mark this well: If economic conditions grow bad, it will be the veteran that will be the stabilizing influence for law and order and it will be the black-market immigrant who will be the nucleus for disorder and violence.

For those who argue that immigrants would be an asset now to our economy, the American Legion says that if they are valuable workers and producers, as claimed, then no country needs them as much as their own. Half of Europe is in ruins. Skilled workers and men with trained minds are sorely needed for the reconstruction of war-devastated nations.

Likewise, if these potential immigrants are anti-Communists, as claimed on their behalf, they can render freedom the greatest service by remaining to combat the spread of communism in their own countries. The young veterans of America already have contributed immeasurably to the overthrow of tyranny throughout the world. It is up to the people freed from the yokes of nazism and fascism to do their part now in defending freedom against other slavish "isms."

There was a time when immigration was a source of national strength for America. That was in the days of free land and of expanding frontiers. Those conditions no longer exist. Today we are trying to readjust to normalcy from the greatest war in all history which took 15,000,000 of our young men and women away from their homes and pursuits and put them into uniforms.

Under these present conditions the need for the run of the mill immigrant has vanished. We don't need the help of foreigners on our farms, in our factories and in our offices when our own veterans and our own war workers can fill every job available.

At the same time the type of immigrants flowing into this country—both legally and illegally—is the lowest in all our history. We are getting the cast-offs of all Europe.

Furthermore, immigration has become a racket of specific racial, religious, or economic groups. They are perverting immigration to increase their own strength and thus pushing back the time when all arrivals in this country will have become assimilated.

The American Legion contends therefore that immigration no longer provides benefits for our Nation at this time—only liabilities. That is why present immigration is a growing menace to America. It conflicts with one paramount objective all loyal Americans have—keeping America always American. The present type of immigrant is poor material for good Americanism. He is poor material for assimilation.

Let's get wise and smart. It pays to start charity and fairness at home. Let's be the Richards to open the door of American opportunities first to American veterans and American war workers.

When we have properly taken care of our own, then we can and we should help the strangers at our door.

INCREASED RENT IN GOVERNMENT HOUSING PROJECTS

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I have been informed by several people that there are approximately 3,000 families living in a dozen different Government housing projects who face increases in their rent of from $1 to $15 a month. These housing projects were occupied by war workers and all during the period of the war when the occupants were making high wages, working overtime, and receiving bonuses their rents were held down.

Many of these projects are now occupied in part by returned war veterans who are working no more than 40 hours a week. I am at a loss to understand why at this time these rents should be raised so substantially when the same rents were kept down during the war under a law that provided for reasonable economic rents as of that time.

I protest the announced increases and urge that the OPA Rent Control Division resurvey the situation in order to determine a fair rent in these projects. I understand the same situation will develop in other parts of the country. What can we say to landlords who have been unable to obtain relief when at the same time the Federal Government is ordering rent increases?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MASON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Taft-Hartley bill and to include quotations from the majority leader on the same subject, and to include also an editorial from the New York Times.

Mr. ROSS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the Washington Star which points up the necessity of our Government doing something now about the mobilization of industry and the protection of agencies of Government in the event of an atomic attack.

AIRPLANE APPROPRIATION

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I wish to correct a statement I made on yesterday. In my original remarks on Tuesday I made the statement that the total amount of money for airplanes in the bill was $440,000,000, and I assumed that that included $280,000,000 for contract authorizations. I was told just before I took the floor yesterday that I was in error about that; that the $280,000,000 was not included in the $440,000,000, and it was pointed out that the bill provided that in addition to the appropriation the Secretary could under contract authorizations have $280,000,000, and I so stated on the floor of the House. After going back to my seat and looking the matter over, I found I was right in the first place; that the party who informed me was wrong, and that the schedule called for $440,000,000 for airplanes including the $280,000,000 contract authorization. Now, that does not change the number of planes. The number of planes that are to be produced or will be produced is the same number that we discussed on the floor yesterday, and I wanted to correct the RECORD. I corrected it last night regarding that statement, but my first statement made on Tuesday was correct.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask for this minute to ask the gentleman from Michigan a question. When he refers to the number of airplanes that are included in the amount, what is the number?

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. I was told that the number of planes was 632 at the present prices, and something like seven-hundred-and-some-odd at the original prices. The question of the number of planes will vary with the type of planes they are going to produce. The War Department is undoubtedly, and properly so, going to take what money we give them to produce heavier bombers and heavier planes, which take a longer time to produce. General Rawlings told me that it would make 632 planes. Now, they may have changed that to 590 planes by increasing the number of heavier planes they are going to build and decreasing the number of fighter planes and make more planes out of the fund.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. VAIL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article entitled "Russia Grabs Our Inventions," by J. Parnell Thomas, appearing in the June issue of the American magazine.

Mrs. NORTON asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD and include an article by Thomas L. Stokes.

LABOR BILL

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, the radio and press carried the statement this morning that the Democrats on the Labor Committee were going down to the White House today to ask President Truman to veto the Hartley-Taft bill, which was passed by the House on yesterday. It so happens that I have been a member of the Committee on Labor for many years. If some two or three Democratic members of the committee want to request the President to veto the bill, it is perfectly within their rights to do so: but I certainly do not think it is a correct statement for either the press or radio to make regardless of the source of their information when they say the Democrats of the committee are going to the President. I have discussed this matter with other Democrats on the committee. They do not propose to join in any such movement, and certainly I do not propose to make any such request of the President. On yesterday the House passed the labor bill by a vote of 320 to 79, a little over 4 to 1. Not only did an overwhelming majority of Republicans vote for the bill but an overwhelming majority of the Democrats, as well, voted for the bill, the Democratic vote being 66 Democrats against and 105 Democrats for the bill. So I think it would be much more accurate to state that a majority of the Democrats in the House hope the President will sign the bill immediately. So far as I am personally concerned, I sincerely hope he will approve the bill.

DISPLACED PERSONS

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi has spoken with his usual lack of information and has stated that the refugees seeking entrance into this country are in the main Communists. He probably has failed to read the exact facts. If he had, he would find that there were 800,000 of those persons, 500,000 of whom are Catholics, 200,000 are Jews, and 100,000 Protestants. They are Balts, Poles, and Slavs. These Slavs, for example, are fleeing from the Tito regime. If they would return, they would be purged.

The Jews refuse to be repatriated. They want no part of the communism that permeates Russia, Poland, Rumania, and Hungary, whence they came. The gentleman from Mississippi speaks with no authority, with no possession of the true facts, and wildly flings his accusations.

Likewise, the Poles are fleeing from the Communist-controlled domain, and the Latvians, Lithuanians, and Esthonians are likewise opposed to communism. He should know that our immigration laws screen immigrants and exclude all Communists and Nihilists and the other categories he mentioned.

Further, you do not find the Communist Party or any Communists advocating the entrance of these displaced persons or refugees into this country. You do not find anybody in the Communist Party advocating the entrance of these people because they know they are opposed to communism.

Refugees, particularly refugee scientists who came to the United States, have enriched this country. They worked on nuclear fission, on aerodynamics, on meteorology, on ballistics and on engineering devices; their researches were immediately and eagerly demanded because of their practical and terrible applicability to the course of the war.

The full story of the role that refugee scientists played in the prosecution of the war has not yet been revealed. Of course, the gentleman from Mississippi closes his eyes to these facts. For example, Dr. Ernst Bari, who had been chief chemist for Austria-Hungary in World War I, came as a refugee to the United States in 1933 and turned his world-renowned skill in chemistry and explosives against the Axis nations. He was a member of the United States Explosives Advisory Committee and cooperated with the United States Chemical Warfare Service and the Navy Ordnance Department. A number of refugee scientists worked in atomic energy: Hans Bethe, Enrico Fermi, Albert Einstein—who suggested the war Manhattan project to Roosevelt—James Franck, and many others.

The names of at least nine refugee scientists have appeared in connection with the development in this country of the atomic bomb, and others may become public as more of the details of the project become common property.

The tremendously practical contributions made by the refugee scientists to their new homeland during time of war will certainly have their counterpart in the peacetime world. They have proved themselves beyond any doubt loyal and patriotic members of American society, ready to share with their new compatriots their intellectual gifts and achievements. Of course, facts of this character mean nothing to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Many more of these scientists are in the DP camps. They would be immeasurably valuable to us if we could bring them to the United States.

Of the six men who participated in the historic flag raising of Iwo Jima, three were of foreign origin. Sergeant Hansen of Somerville, Mass., of Scandinavian origin; Private Gagnon, marine, from Manchester, N. H., of French-Canadian origin; Sergeant Strank from Johnstown, Pa., of Carpatho-Russian origin, coming from Czechoslovakia. A fourth member participant was Private Hayes, who is a full-blooded Pima Indian from Arizona. Hansen and Strank were killed in action. Of course, the gentleman from Mississippi cares naught for these facts concerning refugees and aliens.

AIRPLANE PROCUREMENT

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW] requested information as to how many airplanes this bill would provide. If the Members of the House will turn to the RECORD of June 3 and read the letter of the Secretary of War, which appears on page 6442 and the succeeding page, they will find that this bill provides, as now written, for 561 airplanes. As the gentleman from Michigan has pointed out, the number of airplanes would vary with the type, but that is the number that would be constructed out of these funds which the Secretary of War says are so inadequate under the circumstances.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAHON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Can the gentleman tell the committee how many planes were cut out when the President reduced the 1947 appropriation bill $30,000,000? That will give us an idea of what this cut will do.

Mr. MAHON. I can tell the gentleman that not one single plane was cut out. We appropriated $400,000,000 last year and $30,000,000 was held in reserve or transferred, but that money now is available for airplane procurement. So that clears that.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. That $30,000,000 was transferred to the pay of the Army.

Mr. MAHON. The Army did transfer some funds to the pay of the Army, but in the light of recent developments it will not reduce the procurement program for fiscal 1947, as had been originally thought. Budget officers of the War Department are my authority for this statement.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. REED of New York asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in two instances, in one to give additional wool facts, and in the other to include the law in connection with the little and the big bureaucrats that tell the Congress how to run their business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

LEASING OF PROPERTY BY VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 1135) to extend for 1 year certain provisions of section 100 of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, as amended, relating to the authority of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to enter into leases for periods not exceeding 5 years.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

Mr. RANKIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is that the House bill?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. It is similar to the House bill which was reported out unanimously, I may say to the gentleman from Mississippi. It is the bill the gentleman from Indiana asked that I not take up for 24 hours in order that he might secure from me and the Veterans' Administration certain information as to how General Bradley secured his leases.

Mr. RANKIN. It is the same bill.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Time is very important, because the present act expires the end of the month.

I talked to the gentleman from Indiana who said this was satisfactory and also I obtained the information for the gentleman from California [Mr. PHILLIPS], who is a distinguished member of the appropriations subcommittee that handles veterans' appropriations. The information was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 3 if anyone wishes it for his files.

Mr. WILSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, my purpose the other day in objecting was that I felt this to be a very important matter involving a considerable amount of money. Upon investigation since, I found that it involved an expenditure of more than $8,000,000 which I felt should not come before the House by unanimous consent.

Furthermore, I did not know, and neither did the author of the bill who was calling it up, where these buildings were, what they were to be used for, how much space was involved, or any of the conditions under which we were contracting for that space. We had just had before our subcommittee on public buildings and grounds people from the War Department who told us there were 28,000 square feet of vacant space in the Pentagon Building not being used for anything. Yet, they, the War Department, are using space in 17 other Government buildings in which the taxpayers were being forced to make large outlays of funds for that space. We also found that in the Pentagon they had entered into an agreement with private enterprise for the use of 37,000 square feet of space which was not for war purposes but which space was used for Woodward & Lothrop's, the Walgren Drug Co., and so forth, and in this agreement the War Department Concessions Division had received more than a million dollars, which money was not going back to the Federal Treasury but was going to subsidize the cafeteria of the employees in the Pentagon. They said they did not have permission to rent this space to these private concerns but they could enter into an agreement and take part of the profit. That does not make sense to me. I wondered if the Veterans' Administration was following a similar procedure and if we did not have buildings in Washington or agencies leasing enough space to private enterprise to perhaps pay the total cost of the food of the employees.

The testimony states that these employees of the Pentagon are making an average salary of $2,900 a year, but cannot afford to pay the full price of their lunch and that they must have this subsidy on their food or the War Department cannot get people to go there to work, and that 40 hours a week was too much time to work. Nonsense.

We were told it was necessary to bring concessions out there in the way of a department store and a book store and a jewelry store and all similar things so that people could shop during their off hours. You see they did not have time, working 40 hours a week, to go up town and do their shopping. Therefore, we had to bring these concessions there in order to get the employees. Now, we have this U. S. and Us columnist, the man with the bleeding heart, telling us that the Government employees do not want to leave Washington, and we are going to have to raise money here in Congress to get them out of Washington. The War Department and the Government could not get them to come here and work without subsidies, yet the columnist says that we cannot get them out of Washington or get them to leave unless we raise money to pay their expenses home.

Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to get a few of these matters straightened out. I feel that this problem of building space and the use of that space should be under one committee, so that one committee can know exactly what is going on, because in this report that the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] gives us shows where General Bradley has gone to the Public Buildings Administration, which is under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and has gotten space from them. Now, why cannot one committee handle this space problem and thereby save the taxpayers of this country millions of dollars?

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Reserving the right to object, this is identical with the House bill?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. It is identical with the House bill. I asked to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill in order to expedite the matter. General Bradley would have to vacate some of the buildings at once if it were not passed within a day or two.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second paragraph of section 100 of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, as amended (38 U. S. C. 693), is hereby amended by deleting "June 30, 1947" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "June 30, 1948."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is compelled to state that the time for 1-minute speeches has passed. We have already considered legislation.

Mr. RICH. I simply wanted to try to save the Treasury of the United States, but it will be gone too, some day. So we will just postpone it.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ten Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1948

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3678) making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3678, with Mr. MICHENER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee rose yesterday there was an amendment pending. The time had been fixed at 1 hour, the last 10 minutes of which by unanimous consent was granted to the committee. Accordingly, other Members will be recognized for 4 minutes. The list of gentlemen standing at the time seeking recognition is as follows: Mr. BROOKS of Alabama, Mr. MILLER of Connecticut, Mr. DURHAM of North Carolina, Mr. SASSCER of Maryland, Mr. HARRIS of Arkansas, Mr. FISHER of Texas, Mr. WINSTEAD of Mississippi, Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana, Mr. LARCADE of Louisiana, Mr. RANKIN of Mississippi, Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, Mr. SMATHERS of Florida, Mr. GOFF of Idaho, and Mr. CASE of South Dakota, representing the committee.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the pending amendment be read again for the information of the committee.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Did not the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS] speak on the pending amendment yesterday?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana spoke, if the Chairman remembers correctly, but no Member spoke after the time was fixed. The Clerk took the names of all those standing who desired to speak on the pending amendment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, under the rules of the House and the Committee, may a Member speak more than once on the same amendment? I raise the point, Mr. Chairman, because it occurs to me that in view of the fact that other Members would be restricted to 4 minutes if the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS] has already spoken, and if he were not eligible for recognition, it would make it possible for the others to be recognized for 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the Chair has no discretion in the matter but is bound by the rules. Under the rules of the House, the gentleman may speak on a pro forma amendment.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAHON. At the time the 1 hour was agreed upon yesterday, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL] made the request, and I reserved the right to object to indicate my desire to speak on the amendment, as I was standing at that time. I had offered the amendment and had spoken on it, but it was my understanding there would be 10 minutes for the committee to close debate on the amendment and that 5 minutes would be allotted to the gentleman from Texas and 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan. I realize that both of us had already spoken on the amendment, but I had hoped to be able to carry out my understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL] does not appear on the list. The name of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] does appear; he is to represent the committee, to use the 10 minutes reserved for the committee.

Mr. MAHON. All the 10 minutes would go to the other side of the aisle?

The CHAIRMAN. For the defense of the bill. Therefore, when time is reserved for the committee in opposition to an amendment offered by others, even though they be members of the committee, the majority of the committee closes the debate.

Mr. MAHON. I was on my feet at the time, as would be indicated by the fact that I reserved the right to object, and therefore should be counted among those standing.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan intended that the 10 minutes should be used to close the debate in order to answer the arguments. If the Chair will examine the list, he will find that practically every one of the Members who indicated they wanted to speak will speak for the amendment. The gentleman from Michigan had in mind that the committee ought to have 10 minutes to answer the arguments in favor of the amendment.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, since I was on my feet and reserving the right to object, I would like to know if my name is now on the list.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's name is not on the list, and the fact that a Member is on his feet reserving the right to object does not imply, under the rules of the House, that he is seeking recognition to speak.

Mr. MAHON. That is correct, but I had been on my feet before I spoke on the reservation to object. Now, since some of the Members will not use their time, would it not be proper to place my name on the list?

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I am on the list, I understand. I spoke yesterday and I do not care to utilize that time now. I would be very happy if my colleague from Texas [Mr. MAHON] would be given that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that will be done.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, it should be pointed out, in justice to the others, that practically all the speeches were made on this amendment yesterday in behalf of the amendment. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON] had five additional minutes yesterday. The gentleman consumed 10 minutes on his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. We want everything to be fair and just. The House is now in Committee. The action taken was in the Committee and was not taken in the House. It was done by unanimous consent. Therefore that which was done yesterday in the committee can be changed by unanimous consent. The only way, in the opinion of the Chair, that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON] will be permitted to speak is by unanimous consent that he be given 5 minutes, or whatever time is requested. That would be by unanimous consent.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 5 minutes on the bill, the time assigned to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS], if that is agreeable.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does that mean that the 5 minutes is to come out of the time of the other speakers?

Mr. MAHON. No, Mr. Chairman; I would not want to take it out of anybody else's time.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, if there is going to be any doubt about it, I want to claim my time and I expect to yield to the gentleman from Texas when I do claim it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman contemplate holding the floor during that time?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the gentleman holds the floor, under a strict interpretation of the rules he cannot yield his time. He must retain the floor, but he may yield for an observation or a question.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I renew my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to proceed for 5 minutes in addition to the time fixed yesterday.

Mr. MAHON. No, Mr. Chairman; I do not think it necessary to be in addition to the hour, because there are others who are willing to give me their time. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS] has said he would be glad to have his name taken from the list.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS] asks unanimous consent that he may withdraw from the list and that the name of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON] may be substituted in his stead.

Mr. BROOKS. That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON], who takes the place of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS] on the list.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, may I not speak later rather than at this time? May I not speak nearer the conclusion of the debate and let someone else's name be called now?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wants to be as accommodating at possible. Inasmuch as the Chair has announced the order in which Members will be called, if the others consent this may be done.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, since the gentleman from Texas represents our side, I ask unanimous consent that his name be placed next to the last man on the other side.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I object and demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON] is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped to speak a little later in this debate. The situation is now becoming more clarified. I would like to say I cannot yield to Members for a few minutes. If you will get a report on the bill and turn to page 8 it will be helpful.

I want it clearly understood that I am offering an amendment to restore $40,000,000 to the bill to buy airplanes, the amount requested by the President, the Bureau of the Budget, and urged upon the committee by General Spaatz, chief of the Air Forces. That is the amendment I offered in the Appropriations Committee last and on the floor of the House of Representatives yesterday.

The gentleman from Michigan, our chairman, has in the 1-minute period today explained to the committee the $280,000,000 mistake which was made in his explanation of the bill yesterday. It was urged yesterday that there was $280,000,000 in the pending bill for airplanes that the gentleman now says—and we all agree—is not actually in the bill for airplanes. So it would seem that in view of that misapprehension and misunderstanding all the Members should now be perfectly willing to support my amendment for the $40,000,000 to provide 188 additional planes, the number requested by the Air Forces.

You will see from page 8 of the report that it is indicated that in this bill there is $396,000,000 of new cash money for the purchase of planes and in addition a contract authorization to the extent of $280,000,000, making a total of $640,000,000 to buy planes, as indicated by the gentleman from Michigan yesterday, which he now assures the House is in error by $280,000,000.

The only cash money in this bill to buy new planes is $80,000,000. There is an additional sum of $36,000,000 for spare parts for existing aircraft and $280,000,000 for contract authorizations. This seems to be a very modest sum in the light of the situation confronting our Nation. There can be no doubt about that fact.

When the bill was first marked up no cut was made in aircraft procurement at all, but after it was marked up the committee was reassembled and the cut was made. The cut was made over my protest. It was not a partisan matter. It was just a matter of various Members having different ideas. So the airplane item was cut by $40,000,000.

When the report went to the full committee there was not a line in the report explaining that the airplane procurement item was being cut. I pointed out this mistake and upon my urgent request a report was written in regard to the reduction, a report which I had no part in writing. It is on page 8 of the report. It represents, unfortunately, a $280,000,000 overstatement of the amount of money in the bill for the aircraft program.

The report also has other mistakes which I will not point out. On page 9, for instance, they quote General Rawlings. General Rawlings did not make the statement attributed to him there, as you can see by looking at the hearings, page 616. However, that error is not significant as the statement was made by another officer.

Something was said to the effect that the President last year reduced plane production. The Congress did transfer some funds from the Air Corps to pay of the Army. The Congress did that on the recommendation of the President and it did cut research and development some and at one time it appeared that $30,000,000 would be cut out of the aircraft procurement program, but the budget officer of the Air Forces tells me that indications are that the procurement program will not sustain that $30,000,000 cut.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAHON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. On page 613, General Rawlings testified as follows:

> We took a reduction of $30,000,000 in our money for new aircraft.

That is on page 613.

Mr. MAHON. That is right; he took it, but since that time he has received it back.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in this amendment. I read the hearings very thoroughly prior to the debate yesterday and checked them over again last night. It seems quite clear that this $40,000,000 would have a very advantageous effect not only on the Air Corps but on the airplane industry. I am, frankly, worried at the rapidity and speed with which our aircraft industry has just about folded up.

About a week ago I spoke to the president of the Pratt-Whitney engine division and was shocked to learn that they have had to lay off more than 60 percent of their engineers and some of their research men because they simply have not the money to meet the pay roll. Forty million dollars, in comparison to the amount called for in this bill, is a relatively small sum of money, but it may mean a lot to the airplane industry.

It is unfortunate that the debate which took place here in 1939 has been brought into this discussion. I was one of those who voted for the 5,500 planes already referred to, but I confess now I was in error and that the Committee in its recommendation of 3,400 planes was correct, as none of those planes were built with the funds that were provided at that time. We were not prepared to build modern planes. We did not have the plans for modern planes in 1939. But the situation is different today. The industry is ready to go ahead. We have got away beyond the blueprint stage and every dollar of the $40,000,000 asked for in this amendment will go for the purchase of new, tactical planes.

Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate, too, that partisanship has entered into this discussion both on the floor and off the floor. Yesterday when the Committee rose at 3 o'clock to take up the conference report on the labor bill, a number of Members left the floor and I heard an unfortunate remark made in the presence of several Members of this House. It was said that it was too bad the Committee rose when it did, because "We," meaning those who are on the Democratic side, "had the Republicans on the run." This remark was not made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCMAHON]. I do not care who is on the run myself and I do not care how anybody else votes on this measure. I have made up my mind how I am going to vote on it, but I think it is unfortunate that statements of that kind are made, namely, that one party has the other party on the run. I am willing to discuss politics at the proper time and play my part in that discussion, but when it comes to the future of our Air Corps and our aircraft industry there is no place for political advantage or disadvantage.

Reference was made yesterday to certain Members of Congress being on an airport in Belgium and having red faces when they saw the American bombers going over Germany. I do not think there were any red faces there. Certainly, the proponents of the 5,500 airplanes who discussed the matter in 1939 are not going to come into the House today and say they knew what was going to happen. The record is too plain that those matters that were proposed to Congress in 1939 to strengthen our Army and Navy, to pass lend-lease and repeal the arms embargo were not advanced as war measures or measures in preparation for war. I well remember the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM], standing here on this floor and opening the debate on that bill by saying, "This is not a war measure; this is a peace measure." We were told all through the debates of 1939 and 1940 that the steps we were being asked to take then were not getting ready for war, but were steps to keep us out of war. So, I say it is unfortunate for us to go back to those days when we were considering measures vital to our own national defense.

Mr. Chairman, I urge that we lean toward the side of safety and give the Air Corps this additional $40,000,000 that they say they need.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DURHAM].

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the recently submitted report of the Appropriations Committee on the War Department bill, I feel that it is timely to point out to the members the ever increasingly important role of the Air Force in the national security plans of this Nation.

I do not imply nor state that the distinguished members of the committee did not give the most careful considerations to all of the factors. I do state that before this bill is passed by the House we must examine carefully the fundamental requirements of the armed forces.

I do not propose at this time to enter into a detailed discussion of the dollars and cents items in the bill. Instead I would like to say that I have great confidence in the commanding general of the Army Air Forces and I feel that before the House makes serious cuts in the Air Force recommendations, the most serious consideration of the implications of such a step is in order.

It is a military certainty that the first blows in any future conflict will be struck through the air. It behooves us then to insure that we have given appropriate consideration to all aspects of this air problem. Unless this body gives the most thoughtful consideration to this subject, we cannot intelligently rely upon the officers of the service to carry out their function of national security. Many boards and civilian committees qualified and unprejudiced have given emphasis to the seriousness of this problem and to the great importance of maintaining a suitable and adequate Army Air Force.

President Roosevelt appointed a civilian survey committee headed by Mr. Franklin D'Olier, of New York, who concluded after months of research in both theaters of war that the fundamental problem was an air problem.

Mr. D'Olier assembled a large group of civilian advisers. Even before the war ended they were preparing the background for their studies, both in Europe and in the Far East. The D'Olier committee, in their final report, found that air power was the decisive factor in the struggle against the Nazis, and this committee, in its final report on the war with Japan, pointed out that the collapse of the Japanese Empire was hastened by air power to such an extent that invasion of Honshu was not necessary.

Also, I should like to call to the attention of the members the report of the Presidential advisory commission, headed by Dr. Karl T. Compton. This commission, which has just submitted its report to the President, stated that one of the first requirements of national defense is—

> A striking air force, spearhead of our professional armed services; this force would be charged with the crucial mission of "defense by attack." Its job would be to stop the enemy's first onslaught and to hit back at him with crushing force. We believe that an aggressor's reluctance to start a war, and his handicap in prosecuting it successfully if he did start, would be in direct proportion to the power and readiness of our mobile striking force. Its personnel would have to be highly trained and its equipment would have to be the most advanced in the world.

We cannot take too lightly the fact that for the second time in a brief period a completely unprejudiced board of civilians has pointed to the air as our unguarded frontier and has counseled this country to maintain as a primary weapon an air force in being.

It is hoped that many Members of the House can find the time to read the report of the Presidential advisory commission headed by Dr. Compton. The few sentences I have quoted comprise only the high lights in highly digested form of one aspect of the study of this distinguished group. Civilians who prepared this report comprise an unbiased body. Their findings should not go unheeded. It is the responsibility of the membership of the House to insure the existence of an adequate air force and of a healthy supporting industry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SASSCER].

Mr. SASSCER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to no one in a desire to cut out useless spending. Over a long legislative service I have seen, both in State legislatures and here, cycles first of heedless spending and then of heedless retrenchment. Every speaker on recent appropriation bills, whether for restoration of the particular cut or against it, emphasizes the fact that we need an Army, Navy, and Air Force, a Coast Guard and merchant marine. Then, if we pause, we realize that a person with a knowledge of ordinary fourth-grade arithmetic knows we cannot have these essentials of defense without proper expenditure.

Let us not cripple these vital arms of our Government, when it is agreed by all, and pointed out in able speeches here yesterday, that they are important to the future security of this Nation and the peace of the world. We cannot have them without sane expenditure of public money. Therefore, I trust that the Mahon amendment will be adopted.

To show the danger of hysteria, we have heard speeches coming from the majority members of the Committee on Appropriations that in their retrenchment the armed forces are not to be hurt, but when the armed forces appropriation bills come out of committee we see the Navy, the Marine Corps, the Army, the Air Force, and the Coast Guard crippled. On this Army appropriation bill we hear speeches to the effect that this drastic cut in Air funds will not hurt the Air Force. In this hysterical approach the committee and the House are assuming that there is $280,000,000 more appropriated for the Air Force than there actually is. On page 8 of the report there is listed $396,000,000 of new funds in this bill and $280,000,000 of contract authority. Everyone in the House yesterday assumed from the report and speeches that there was, therefore, $676,000,000 of new funds and contract authorization. Upon investigation I find that a colossal mistake of $280,000,000 has been made, and that actually, instead of there being $396,000,000 of new funds in the bill and $280,000,000 of contract authorization, the $280,000,000 is included in the $396,000,000, leaving $80,000,000 cash and some $36,000,000 for parts, and so forth, for existing aircraft, and ending up with the House about to vote on the erroneous theory that they are authorizing $280,000,000 more than they actually are.

I call upon the gentleman from Michigan, the chairman of the subcommittee, in his closing 10 minutes to state whether or not the statement I have just made is correct, or whether or not there is an arithmetical error of $280,000,000 in the calculation.

Let me cite just one little example—which may be somewhat trivial so far as the over-all picture is concerned—how money may be lost instead of saved by false retrenchment. Right now, due to the drastic cuts in our War Department, a policy has been inaugurated in the military camps to replace civilian trained firemen with military personnel. The directive says that it is not the policy of the Government to use military personnel except as a necessary augmentation of the civilian personnel. But when the civilian personnel is laid off, then the next step is the necessary placing of the military personnel needed elsewhere to do that work. Accordingly, today in our Army camps civilian firemen are being laid off and soldiers are being trained for 30 days to take the place of the civilian firemen. Master sergeants are to become chiefs of fire departments. Anyone who is at all familiar with fire fighting knows that a trained fireman is an artisan with years of training and experience, as is evidenced by the civil-service requirements for these civilian positions. He is a trained man just as much as a lawyer, a plumber, a doctor, or any other artisan. Most of these men now protecting Government property in the camps are former volunteer firemen with years of experience, many ex-GI's who are well trained and competent.

I know one large Army camp covering seven States in that particular area where the number of companies have been cut exactly in half, and where these experienced civilian firemen are being laid off to be replaced by some 400 who will have had only 30 days' training.

I am not going to make this as a prediction because I am too apprehensive about it. I merely express the fear that although we may be saving a few hundred thousand dollars in the salaries of these civilian firemen, when you consider that the structure of property is the same as it was during the war and the fire risk is even greater because of the fact that in some instances training barracks are being converted into four-unit apartments, a fire may well break out and the loss of Government property will many, many, many times exceed the pittance in savings that will take place by the differential in pay between the Army personnel and the civilians. The Army personnel will be there today and gone somewhere else tomorrow. They did not enlist in the Army to become firemen. I understand many of them do not like the duty. The civilian fireman stays on the job. I hope sufficient funds will be appropriated to maintain the functioning of these civilian fire fighters. I hope the War Department will discontinue the policy of manning these fire departments by military personnel rather than civilian personnel.

In addition to the false economy of the move to replace these civilians with Army personnel, there is the incident hardship to the firemen who were trained for this work, in which employment opportunities are limited.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SASSCER] has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I think the Committee is going to consider this important amendment on the basis of what we feel is needed for our airplane-procurement program.

Personally, I feel that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON] is highly desirable and necessary, and I hope that it prevails.

Mr. Chairman, I join with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER], who just preceded me a moment ago, concerning the implications of partisan politics in a matter of this kind. I know we are all deeply interested in our program for economy. I, as other Members of the House, am very much in accord with the desire to economize, and in our zeal to economize we want to do the very best that we can, both Democrats and Republicans. I think this is a matter that we should consider certainly not on a partisan basis but on the basis of what is needed by our Army Air Forces in maintaining and adequately equipping our air force.

Therefore, I want to mention to you just two or three things which I hope you will consider. It has not been my privilege to serve on either the Committee on Military Affairs or on the Appropriations Subcommittee having jurisdiction of War Department appropriations. It has been my privilege, however, to serve on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which committee has devoted many months of study to the subject of aviation.

You have heard that the War Department originally thought it would be necessary to have approximately 1,800 planes in their procurement program for 1948. But in considering the over-all program and what they would be able to do they submitted a request in September of 1946 for 932 planes. That does not necessarily mean a great deal so far as the number of planes is concerned, but in that request they asked for 16,000,000 pounds of air-frame weight. That is the thing that counts. You might have several hundred small planes or you might have 1,600, but how much airplane do you have is the thing that counts. We are all familiar with the fact that the President appointed an Air Coordinating Committee during the war and it did a marvelous job. This House unanimously approved a bill this last week establishing the Committee on a permanent basis. That Committee recommended the minimum production of airplanes for 1948 should be 3,200, or 34,000,000 pounds of air-frame weight. If this reduction prevails and the reduction of our Navy procurement program prevails this minimum request will be more than 50 percent reduced. Think of it. Reducing our air force procurement program by more than 50 percent of what is determined to be a safe minimum by those responsible for our national defense.

We cannot afford to curtail this program to such a dangerous level. If we do we are endangering our further security.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS] has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. FISHER] for 4 minutes.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON] to restore $40,000,000 for the support of the Air Corps and the building of additional planes to contribute to the future security of this country.

There is some confusion about this bill as to just how crippling the cut of $40,000,000 may be, as far as the procurement of airplanes during the next fiscal year is concerned. I am wondering if the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS] could enlighten us further with respect to the need and importance of the pending amendment.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Without yielding the floor, if the gentleman will yield me sufficient time to make a short statement——

Mr. FISHER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a bluntly factual statement to corroborate the figures given to the members of the committee by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON]. He is entirely correct.

The War Department estimate submitted included a request for $440,000,000 for 932 planes and spare parts, considered the minimum to maintain a 55-group Air Force partially equipped with modern equipment. If this rate of replacement is continued for the next few years, it would result in the Air Force only having 28 groups equipped with modern fighting equipment. Cost estimates for 932 planes were based on September 1946 cost. Later increases in cost since that time have reduced the program to 749 planes; the reduction will eliminate 188 additional airplanes and will reduce the total program to 561 planes. The restoration of $40,000,000 will allow for the production of 749 planes.

The report on page 8 is erroneous in several respects on total procurement. New funds in this bill are tabulated at $396,000,000. There is the item of contract authority in the bill of $280,000,000. The fact is that new funds in the bill are only $116,000,000, $36,000,000 of which is for spare parts. They are out of the way in the amount of $280,000,000. The members of the subcommittee on both sides of the aisle know that to be a fact, and the committee on this side of the aisle should accept the amendment.

Mr. FISHER. I thank the gentleman for his statement, and I am sure he has made a most convincing revelation of the vital importance of this particular amendment now pending. The gentleman has given facts that should remove any doubt as to the importance of restoring the cut.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISHER. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. The gentleman pointed out there were 1,700 aircraft required by the Army. The Bureau of the Budget allowed 932. The result of the action of the committee cuts it down to 561, which is less than one-third of the number which is required by the Army Air Forces to keep up their flying groups. It seems to me that the importance of this is in the number of aircraft and not in the number of dollars involved, because we must have aircraft for the national defense.

Mr. FISHER. I thank the gentleman for his very pertinent observation. This is no time to speculate. In this time of uncertainty America must remain strong. We cannot afford to take chances. We must remain strong not only from the standpoint of meeting our commitments abroad and providing for our national security, but in order to add strength and prestige to our emissaries at the peace conferences.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. FISHER] has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WINSTEAD] for 4 minutes.

Mr. WINSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot understand some of the statements that have been made during the discussion of this bill. I wish to commend the committee on the fact that they did not cut the funds at least for scientific research and development; but I cannot understand how Members of this House could support appropriations, as they recently did, for distribution throughout the world, supported by strong statements as to how we expect to stop the spread of communism, and then at this early hour vote to reduce the Air Force of this country. We know that our greatest weapon is the atomic bomb. We likewise know that our only means of applying it to the enemy is through air power. Certainly our greatest and most important defense is the Air Force of this country.

As the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY], the gentleman from California, [Mr. HINSHAW], and many others pointed out, it takes time to produce airplanes. Mr. HINSHAW stated yesterday that in 1939 and 1940 America had, out of approximately 2,000 planes, only 52 that were fit for combat duty. Had the Congress not been so economy-minded in those days and maintained an adequate Air Force millions of dollars would have been saved, many American lives spared and probably the tragic fate of Pearl Harbor eliminated. As the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DURHAM], stated, the information given our committee some few weeks ago revealed that there are only two airplane factories today operating at a profit. As was pointed out yesterday, not a single plane the design of which was drawn since the time of Pearl Harbor got into action during the war. We did not use a single jet-propelled plane during the war, but we are beginning to make some progress along that line now.

To me it is utter nonsense that the Congress of the United States should be swayed by the argument that since the President of the United States cut so much last year this Congress should further reduce these funds. In passing I want to say that he did, in my opinion, cut too severely the research and development program, but he did not cut the funds for acquisition of airplanes. Yet some argue that this Congress must go him one better, even to the extent of crippling the Air Force. Such argument is utter nonsense.

Another thing, the committee has cut the entire armed services program approximately 8 percent, yet at the same time they have cut the Air Forces approximately 10 percent. I am willing to help the Appropriations Committee and the Committee on Armed Services eliminate waste and extravagance in the armed services, but $40,000,000 is only 10 percent of the Greek-Turkish loan. It is but little more than 10 percent of the recent general European relief bill. I did not vote for the British loan, I did not vote for the last appropriation for UNRRA, I did not vote for the $350,000,000 relief bill. I have about as conservative a voting record in this Congress as can be found. But let me say here and now that I have not forgotten so soon that we pledged the people of this country that when this war was over we would never again permit ourselves to be caught unprepared to meet any emergency.

Yes, through scientific research and development we produce new weapons and I believe the time will come when we will not need so many airplanes, but until that time does come there is only one source of adequate defense, only one medium with which to carry the battle to the enemy should it be necessary, and that is through the air. The Chairman of this Committee asked yesterday, "Who knows what Russia is doing?" When no one knows what Russia is doing, and until such time as we do know, no reduction in appropriation for air power can be justified.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ALLEN] for 4 minutes.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, in view of the very frank and honest statement made by the chairman of the Armed Services Committee of the House a few minutes ago, I hope that the gentleman from Michigan, chairman of the subcommittee, will not even take the floor and oppose this increase now because I think the case has been made out so clearly that there ought to be complete unanimity in this House for the appropriation.

Failure to adopt the Mahon amendment to increase this appropriation by $40,000,000 for the Air Force would be a step backward. Those of us who have been Members of this House for some time have seen some very important votes here, some strategic votes, and in my opinion, we are approaching a vote like that at this time. Instead of raising the appropriation by $40,000,000, in view of the admission that has been made on the floor here that an error has been made, we ought to vote a greater raise than $40,000,000. Congress has voted to send money and help to Europe and to other parts of the world, and certainly no one should deny necessary funds for our own national defense.

We are approaching, perhaps, the most critical time in world affairs, certainly a time when aggression is rampant, certainly a time when a great nation of this world is on the march. A few days ago we saw how this nation, Russia, swallowed up another nation overnight when only 17 percent of the voters in that small nation agreed to the philosophies of the nation doing the swallowing. Yet we have seen that happen. Mr. Chairman, we are facing a sad spectacle in this House when instead of preparing this Nation, instead of facing the issue squarely and getting this Nation ready for any eventuality, we are cutting down an important arm of our national defense. It is not good sense, it is not good judgment, it is not good business, it is not good legislative procedure; and I appeal to the Members on both sides, not as a political proposition, but as a question of paramount national defense. We want and fervently pray for peace, but we cannot let down our guard at a time like this. I ascribe to the gentlemen on both sides of the aisle the highest of patriotic motives and I call upon the gentlemen on both sides today to exemplify that high patriotic motive that I know dwells in the hearts of all of us, and to do the thing that we ought to do; that is, increase this appropriation by $40,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, when this bill goes to the other body I hope that body will rectify some of the errors that admittedly have been made. I am astonished that a great mistake has been made by the committee in computing the funds for national defense, as appears from what we have heard this evening, and my only regret is that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON] who offered his amendment to increase the appropriation by $40,000,000 for airplanes did not make his motion for a much larger sum than that. By all means the amendment ought to prevail, and then when this bill gets to the Senate that body will have before it all the information which was revealed here after this motion was offered, and will have an opportunity to go into the question at greater length; and I hope will see fit to sustain not only this amendment to increase the appropriation by this sum, but to increase it to whatever sum may be shown needed. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to see the request for planes cut by a single plane. I want the Air Force to have every plane it thinks necessary, and I stand ready to so vote. But the only thing we have before us now is this particular amendment and it is unthinkable that this House should vote it down.

After the First World War our national defense was starved. Are we to start down that dangerous road again? Not by my vote. The world situation now is too explosive to play with. The very psychology of reducing an appropriation for our Air Force now is bad, very bad. Defeat this amendment and the Russian radio will announce with glee that the American Congress has refused this fund for planes. No, Mr. Chairman, it is imperative that we pass this amendment today. We must back up our Air Force and our armed services generally.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LARCADE].

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON].

Mr. Chairman, when I was first a candidate as a Member of the House of Representatives I promised my constituents if I was elected that, if I could prevent it by my vote, this country would never again be caught in the defenseless position in which we have been found in the last two World Wars, and that it was my opinion that we should acquire or control all of the islands and bases wherever necessary to build an impregnable ring of steel around our country; maintain an up-to-date, modern, and strong Air Force, a strong Navy and Army, and a trained Reserve as it was my opinion that if we had such a strong Military Establishment we would never be attacked again or drawn into another World War. On this promise and platform I was elected, and in two succeeding elections I have reiterated that pledge and, since by my election I feel that my constituents in my district approve of that position, I propose to do all in my power to carry out this promise.

Mr. Chairman, while I appreciate the fact that we should make every effort to reduce the cost of government in order to make it possible to reduce taxes, I do not think that we should weaken our military departments under any circumstances. As a matter of fact, I feel that in the long run it would be economical, and I therefore will support and vote for the pending amendment.

Mr. Chairman, only this week the report of President Truman's Advisory Commission on Universal Military Training made it clear in regard to the danger which confronts this country at this time and sounded a grave warning when they said:

> The Commission recommends the adoption of universal military training because we are convinced that weakness on our part not only involves our country in grave risks but also weakens the United Nations, on which rests our hopes for lasting peace. A weak and irresolute America is an invitation to failure. A strong and resolute America is the best guaranty for our safety and for the success of the United Nations.

This Commission, Mr. Chairman, is composed of outstanding Americans and they have made a full study and careful investigation of the situation as it affects our country in the world, and in justice to our country we can do naught but heed the warning of these distinguished citizens.

Experience developed during the last war has proven without doubt that our Air Force was largely responsible for our winning the war in both theaters of operations, and with the discovery of the atomic bomb we should, and we must, be prepared to defend our country, and it is a known fact that a strong air force with long range is the most effective weapon to combat the machines of destruction which we all know exist, even today. In the list of recommendations for our proper defense the advisory committee of the President made this recommendation with respect to our Air Force:

> 5. A striking air force: Spearhead of our professional armed services, this force would be charged with the crucial mission of "defense by attack." Its job would be to stop the enemy's first onslaught and to hit back at him with crushing force. We believe that an aggressor's reluctance to start a war, and his handicap in prosecuting it successfully if he did start, would be in direct proportion to the power and readiness of our mobile striking force. Its personnel would have to be highly trained and its equipment would have to be the most advanced in the world.
> 6. Long-range operations of great destructive power and control of strategic bases might be decisive elements in determining the outcome of a war. Since we could not under our Constitution, and would not under our conception of international morality, launch a surprise attack against any country without an open declaration of war, the enemy would have the advantage of surprise. Replacements would have to be available speedily in large numbers. Maintenance of planes, mechanized equipment, and the host of highly technical weapons and devices developed by science increases the need for specialists, supply troops, and unbreakable supply lines.

Mr. Chairman, only a few days ago an editorial appeared in the Washington News discussing a preview of atom war; and, in outlining the means to combat such a war, I desire to quote what was said in regard to air power as follows:

> Swift, powerful retaliation for an atom attack can be delivered only if we have big, highly trained, and properly equipped striking forces ready to go.
> We can't improvise B–36's, for example, or the expert crews to fly them with atom-bomb loads to far-away objectives.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that the Committee will vote for the amendment by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON] to increase the appropriation for our Air Forces in order that the increased number of planes the amount will produce can be obtained to at least give that branch of the service some semblance of strength for the protection of our country.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to quarrel with the majority members of the committee. I agree with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] that this is not a partisan issue. The talk about having each other on the run is nonsense. If we act now as the authorities did in the twenties when Gen. Billy Mitchell was crucified for trying to build up an air force, some foreign power may have us all on the run, within the next few years.

This is a matter of defense of the entire country.

I cannot forget that years ago Gen. Billy Mitchell, one of the great men of this Nation, was court-martialed and turned out in disgrace for trying to build an air force. The result was the Pearl Harbor disaster. I remember fighting along with Frank Reid, one of the most patriotic men who ever served in this House, a Republican from Illinois, in defense of General Mitchell. I saw his program destroyed by the brass hats and the politicians of that day, with the disastrous result that we have gone through a war of the most devastating proportions, which might have been avoided if Billy Mitchell's program had been carried out.

In 1937 I was sent to Hawaii to investigate the question of statehood. I found, and I said then, that Hawaii was inadequately defended from the standpoint of an air force. The man in charge of the air force stated to me at that time that he never was so glad to hear anything said in his whole life. He said I was absolutely right. Yet, they dickered along and left Hawaii in that defenseless position until Pearl Harbor came and our Navy was destroyed by a gang of savage Japs coming 5,000 miles and administering the greatest humiliation this country has ever known.

We are faced with the greatest crisis in world history; we need not "kid" ourselves. Communism is making war on the United States. If you do not believe that, just come down and hear some of the testimony taken before the Committee on Un-American Activities by witnesses who know. If you do not believe that communism is planning war on the United States, just come over and hear some of the testimony given by men who know what is going on behind the iron curtain.

I say that we should have the strongest air force on earth. We should keep the atomic bomb, and I am in favor of turning it back to the military authorities, keeping a supply of bombs on hand, keeping planes equipped to distribute them and aviators trained to operate them, keep our Air Force ahead of any other air force on earth, because you are dealing with a savage force that does not recognize anything on earth but force, or power.

So long as a few diplomats in frock coats and black ties and white shirts give way before Molotov, Gromyko, and Stalin and the rest of them, America will continue to be the object of attack, and we will continue to inspire the contempt of those very forces that we are going to have to stop by force that they will understand, and that is the Air Corps and probably the atomic bomb.

I am not quarreling with the Chairman of the Committee the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL], and I am not making this a partisan issue. God knows it was not a partisan issue when my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] and my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] gave their limbs in the service of the Air Corps of this Nation. This is a national issue that affects the whole country. We cannot afford to back down and let our Air Force be weakened at this hour when it means more, probably, than all the other armed forces combined.

I trust that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON] will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, it is with a mixed feeling of pride and disappointment that I stand here and advocate the increase in funds for the Air Corps, with which I served. I take pride in the fact that I was a member of the United States Army Air Force during the war, and I take pride in the wonderful work that our Air Force did in bringing that war to a favorable conclusion. But it is with a feeling of disappointment that I find it necessary for me to stand here and defend that Air Force which 3 years ago was our first line of defense against the most powerful and destructive military machine in the history of civilization.

I think it is generally conceded by all of the military heads as well as civilian authorities that our Air Force constitutes our first line of defense as well as our main striking force, and that statement will hold true for the future as well as now. When a bill is brought out that will allow the whole United States Army Air Force to build only 561 planes, I think it is time for somebody to get up here and say something about it, because if you remember, just 3 years ago 561 planes did not even constitute one raiding complement. We were sending thousands of planes on one single raid over Germany and thousands of planes in one single raid over Japan. No, I think instead of increasing this appropriation by $40,000,000 we ought to increase it by $320,000,000. I think every dollar invested in the United States Army Air Force and the Navy Air Force is an investment in America's future, an investment in America's security. I for one am willing to give General Spaatz what he asked for, because he is an authority on the subject, and knows our needs. General Eaker is also an authority on the subject. They were pioneers in the field of aviation. They know the military needs of the United States, and yet they came in with a very modest request for 749 airplanes, and we have cut them down to 561. I want to see this Congress replace that $40,000,000, with which to build those other 188 planes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In all seriousness, may I submit this question to the gentleman: General Spaatz has called for enough money to provide some 720 planes. Is that the proposition?

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand from the committee, President Truman's request, based on General Spaatz' testimony, was for 749 airplanes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In the event of serious difficulty, what would 720 planes do?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Seven hundred and forty planes can carry a lot of atomic bombs. They can carry 740.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But will they suffice? That is the question. Will it take 740 planes or 4,000 or 90,000 planes? What is our program?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it takes 90,000 planes, I am in favor of giving them 90,000 planes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Why does the military hesitate to come here and ask for what common sense says they need, instead of only 720 planes, if that is the figure?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The military knows how this Congress is disposed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is not a question of how this Congress is disposed.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. The fact is that General Spaatz originally asked for 1,700 planes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is what I wanted to bring out.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. It was cut to 943, and without this amendment it goes to 561.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thank the gentleman.

Four years ago I was given an airplane to fly overseas that was the fastest and the latest thing out, a Martin B–26, built up here in Baltimore. That plane had a cruising speed of 200 miles an hour, and it was absolutely the fastest thing anybody had ever heard of in those days in the way of bombers. Today that plane is not only obsolete, it is ancient and they do not even use them any more. They have destroyed the few they had left. By the same token, the B–17 is not only obsolete, it is ancient. They are destroying them as fast as they can and replacing them with B–29's and B–36's. Even the B–29 is obsolete. It is being replaced by the B–36. I believe that we ought to go ahead and give these funds to the Army Air Force so that they can keep a first-rate Air Corps in existence to ward off the attacks of an enemy until we can develop and produce airplanes that we need to defend ourselves adequately.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS].

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. Chairman, I subscribe to the statements made by my colleague from Mississippi. There is much that I do not know about air power. I was not in the Air Forces. There is a lot I do not know about jet propulsion and the technicialities of the procurement of aircraft. But every one of us knows, certainly, that air power today is our first line of defense. We all know that if we are to protect ourselves we must maintain that defense.

It has been intimated and alleged, as a matter of fact, during the debate that it would be a mistake to vote for this $40,000,000 for the Army Air Forces. I think it would be better to say that two mistakes could very easily be made this afternoon. The first mistake, we will say, would be to vote for the $40,000,000 for the Army Air Forces, and if in 2, 3, or 4 or 5 years it proved unnecessary we will have wasted $40,000,000. On the other hand, the second mistake could be if we failed to vote for this $40,000,000 amendment this afternoon. We might stop and contemplate for just a moment the mistake that we would then make. If we were attacked, and we had no adequate air force we would do well to think of the devastation and destruction that would result to our country. We might well think of the American lives which would be lost. Certainly, we cannot add up in dollars and cents the incalculable loss that would result to America in lives and property damage.

So it is true that we can make a mistake—we can easily make a tremendous mistake here this afternoon. Being patriots and people who want to protect this country and who are concerned about its welfare and survival, then certainly all doubts should be resolved in favor of defending our country and protecting it in any eventuality. A mistake of $40,000,000 would appear inconsequential and of no concern whatever in the event that we might be attacked and our security was at stake. We would rue the day we made the mistake of saving $40,000,000, but lost our country.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMATHERS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MAHON. There has been some discussion about the cutback which the President made which was later enacted into law by a transfer of the Air Corps funds to pay of the Army. It is true that the President cut down by $75,000,000 the research and development program and we are going along on that level during the next year because we could not keep up at the high level upon which we had been operating during the war. It is true that at one time it appeared that $30,000,000 which were available for plane production out of 1947 funds could not be used by reason of the action of the Congress and the President. But I am told by the budget officer of the Air Forces that now through savings effected otherwise they will be able to use all the money which they heretofore requested of Congress for the aviation program in 1947. And be that as it may, does not the gentleman think if a mistake was made in reductions last year it does not make any sense to aggravate the mistake by making a greater one this afternoon?

Mr. SMATHERS. I certainly subscribe to the remarks made by the gentleman.

Mr. MAHON. Does not the gentleman realize as a man who has served in the armed forces that research and development often takes 4 or 5 years to produce results? Research and development that is carried on this year is not going to do any good next year or perhaps in 2 years from now but eventually it will. So anything that may have been cut out of research and development last year will not affect planes provided for in this appropriation bill.

Mr. SMATHERS. Absolutely. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. MAHON. I would like the gentleman to understand and the Members of the House to understand that any mistake made in this bill has been made in good faith, and all Members on both sides of aisle so far as I know are doing their best to serve the country. There is a difference of opinion, of course, and I agree with the gentleman that $40,000,000 is not enough to restore to this bill for airplane purchases. If I had thought I could raise it to $100,000,000, I would have offered such an amendment.

Mr. SMATHERS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MAHON. But in line with the budget estimate and the request of the War Department and with the hope of getting favorable action, I have offered the amendment for $40,000,000 which I, myself, think is inadequate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. GOFF].

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Chairman, I agree with my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] that it is unfortunate that an attempt to enter into partisan politics has been made in this discussion. I am happy to say that today we have seen little evidence of what took place yesterday.

I think in considering this amendment we ought to try to determine who our potential enemies may be and against whom we are likely to use any armed force that we build up. I think most of us will agree that the only potential enemy we have right now is the country of Russia. In considering Russia we ought to also decide what type of military force would be effective against such an enemy. When I say this I do not want anyone to think that I believe war with Russia is inevitable. If war comes it will be only because we are first attacked. We cannot hope to cope with Russia on the basis of land armies. Hitler tried 220 divisions of the best ground forces that up to that time had ever existed and they were defeated. Napoleon tried the same thing with the Grand Army. We are not going to fight Russia with our ground forces and we are not going to fight Russia with our Navy. Our Navy can blockade Russia all it wants to, but the Soviet Union is a self-sufficient country that our Navy cannot be effective against.

I invite attention to the fact that times have changed since the airplane came. The north polar barrier does not mean anything any more. Across the top of the world it is only a matter of 5,000 miles from Europe and Asia into any of our major cities in the United States. If we are going to stop an attacking force, that force is going to come from the air. Our Army and Navy is not going to defend this country in case of any attack that can be seen now. That is why it is so vital that we maintain the most effective air force in the world.

I have stood for economy. I think the beatings of the breast and the tears on the part of some of the Members on the other side who have fought every effort to cut down excess Government personnel comes with poor grace now. If we were not paying out so much in salaries for excess Federal employees we would not be worrying about funds to meet vital expenditures such as this. This is not an amendment to restore personnel. It is to buy a war machine. I would be opposed to it if it were merely to increase personnel. The only criticism I have of the Appropriations Committee is that in general it has not made its cuts deep enough so far. I shall vote for the increase in funds provided for in this amendment, and I serve notice on the Appropriations Committee that I shall propose amendments to cut enough more out of funds for the bureaus that are still to be considered so that we will not have to decrease the over-all savings to be made in the President's budget. I am going to vote for this amendment and I hope every other ex-service man here will support it.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOFF. I yield.

Mr. COX. I wish to applaud the gentleman's statement to the effect that this is not a party question. I am confident that our friends on the right are not disposed to make any party question out of it, nor am I even willing to suspect they, under any circumstances, would cripple the armed forces of this country. The weight of the argument thus far, in my judgment, has been on the side of the proponents of this amendment and I can think of no finer thing that could be done than for the committee handling the bill to accept the amendment and for the committee to adopt it by a unanimous vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. GOFF] has expired.

Pursuant to the unanimous-consent agreement, the last 10 minutes of the 1 hour which closes the debate on this amendment is allotted to the committee. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] in behalf of the committee.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, if ever a person were in a peculiar position, I am in it now. I see a smile on the face of the gentleman from Texas. As he has pointed out, when the bill was originally marked up tentatively, this cut was not in the bill. In a review meeting before we sent the bill to the printer the cut was made. There were some other problems involved. As has already been indicated here on the floor as a means of getting agreement on the bill and protecting what I considered to be proper action on the bill in some other respects, I did not finally hold out against the cut of this—not $40,000,000 but $44,000,000. I said that if a majority wanted to go ahead, if the cut was restored in the other body and it came to conference, they would probably find me voting to concur in the restoration. I see the gentleman from Texas nods his head.

I want to say this, however, and I think in all fairness to the position of the committee, that while we agree in sentiment with many of the speeches that have been made here, many of the speeches were made in obvious unawareness of the facts involved. It seems to me that before the record is closed about the situation with regard to the Air Forces that it should be set forth a little more in detail.

The question is not whether we are going to have only 561 airplanes, 789 airplanes, 838 airplanes, or 961 or whatever the proposed funds will buy. You already have an air force on hand and in being. It is a good air force and it is getting better. It has shaken off the early demobilization relapse.

Under the original estimate for the Army it was planned to have 401,000 men in the Air Forces. As the result of agreement among the Army heads, with which the committee had nothing to do, the Air Forces were reallotted 375,000 as total strength in the 1,070,000-man Army. Who made the decision, I do not know, but it was a War Department decision and, after all, that means one-third of all the Army is in the Air Forces. That is a far cry, a great advance, from the days of Billy Mitchell and even from 1941, when, if I remember correctly, the Air Corps was about one-fifteenth of total Army strength.

We had on hand as of the 1st of January 1947 planes of the Air Forces good for 5 years' service, 30,566; and 60,000-plus spare engines and parts to go along with them. Over 30,000 planes good for 5 years for 375,000 officers and men—1 plane for every 12 men. And we have other planes coming up. I have put the figures on the blackboard here. From 1945 funds there was $343,000,000-plus for the procurement of 733 planes. Those are to be turned out by the aircraft industry, presumably before the end of 1947, and definitely before June 30, 1948.

From 1946 funds the Air Forces had $288,000,000 on order, funds appropriated and obligated to provide another 635 planes.

Out of 1947 funds they have $416,000,000-plus for the construction of another 681 planes.

I am as concerned as others who have spoken about keeping the aircraft industry in the country in a position where it can have a fairly steady flow of production and keep in position to turn out the planes we need. I called attention the other day during the first speech by the gentleman from Texas to the fact that an interested committee had suggested that there ought to be at least 3,000 planes produced for military purposes a year. Let us look over the present situation. When you add 733 and 635 and 681 together you will see that the Army has provided a pretty sizable backlog for keeping the industry on a sound basis. At least the situation was such that last fall the President and the Budget Bureau thought they could take away $30,000,000 of the money we had appropriated for airplane procurement in 1947 funds.

We come now to this proposition: This year the budget request which came to us called for $400,000,000 for the procurement of planes of which $280,000,000 was to be in the form of contract authorization, as has been brought out during the debate. In addition to that, $40,000,000 was requested for spare engines and parts and another $40,000,000 for radio and radar. When the 10-percent cut was suggested in the subcommittee, it applied not only to the $400,000,000, but also to the $40,000,000; so there was an actual cut in the bill of $44,000,000. I am trying to be perfectly frank with the Committee of the Whole House. This amendment, if it were to restore all of the cut that was made, should restore $44,000,000 instead of $40,000,000.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Not for a moment. I have two or three things I want to be sure to mention during my time.

Last year after the Congress had appropriated money for the procurement of planes and for research and development, the President came along and impounded $135,000,000 that Congress had appropriated for the Air Forces. It was proposed to use this money for other purposes, principally for pay of personnel, by transferring it from the Air Forces to other accounts.

There is no question about that. The record is clear. You will find it on pages 612 and following of the hearings. It is detailed there in question and answer form through interrogations addressed by members of the committee to General Rawlings, General LeMay, and General Spaatz.

I took the matter up on page 612. In reply to a question by me, General Spaatz said:

That $135,000,000 would take $75,000,000 from research and development definitely. General Rawlings can give you the breakdown.

General RAWLINGS. For research and development $75,000,000 was cut out, and in our opinion that has delayed the program probably a year or a year and a half. Do you agree with that, General LeMay?

General LEMAY. Yes, sir.

Going, on General Rawlings said:

We took a reduction of $30,000,000 in our money for new aircraft. I will give you some of the other lesser items.

Then he went on to detail the balance of the $135,000,000.

As a result of our discussion there, some of us were quite disturbed over the fact that the President, through the Budget Bureau, cut back this $135,000,000, particularly the $75,000,000 on research and particularly the $30,000,000 for procurement of new planes. So we started asking if that money were not used for pay of the Army and to take care of the pay increases for civilian personnel, would they be able to spend that money on the purposes for which it was appropriated. I want to read the answer to that question. On page 614 you will find this question and answer:

Mr. CASE. You are saying that if Congress should refuse to transfer this money and let it be available for expenditure, you would not be able to spend it for that purpose?

General RAWLINGS. I would say that is correct, sir. We could not economically obligate this money for research and development in the time remaining available in the fiscal year.

Then we asked with regard to the procurement of planes. At first they were uncertain because of the problem of working out definite contract details before the end of the fiscal year. General Eaker, however, answered that question affirmatively, and you will find it on page 711:

Mr. CASE. * * * It is still impossible to purchase or to make definitive contracts for the purchase of complete aircraft within this next year?

General EAKER. No, sir; it is not. It would be possible to make procurement of some of those airplanes that were cut. This was discussed earlier in the record.

On that record which the committee by interrogation brought out, the War Department has now put back this $30,000,000 for procurement of airplanes that the gentleman from Texas has called attention to. If this committee has not done any other thing, you should give it credit for having gotten that $30,000,000 back in the 1947 funds for the procurement of aircraft. That money was lost for airplane procurement until we indicated by our questioning that we thought it should be used for that purpose for which it had been appropriated.

We also put the bee on the situation so far as research and development is concerned. I want to call your attention to the testimony on that when we were talking with General LeMay. General LeMay is the man who is now in charge of the research and development program for the Army Air Forces. He was the commander of the strategic air force of B–29's in the Pacific.

On page 616 you will find this statement by General LeMay:

When the $75,000,000 cut came it was the straw that broke the camel's back. It meant a cut of from 20 to 30 percent. So the people who had been working on the program to get the money obligated had to stop that, because we did not want to let any contracts that were not necessary in the revised program.

And General Spaatz answered an inquiry in this fashion. I read from page 615 of the hearings:

When this money was taken away in January it was necessary to reprogram the entire research and development program for 1947. The return of a substantial amount of money at this time would mean that we would have to reprogram again in order to have an integrated over-all program. Wherefore we do not believe it possible to intelligently obligate the $75,000,000 for research and development before the end of the current fiscal year.

It was explained that research expenditures have to be programed in advance to be handled efficiently. Then the chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL], asked if we were now being asked to appropriate money for fiscal 1948 for the purpose for which the money transferred had been appropriated last year for fiscal 1947.

The answer to that, Mr. Chairman, is that the research and development is at a certain level and what we have lost is time. We are not trying to make up that loss in the 1948 appropriations. But we have taken the loss in time, so instead of the 5-year research and development program that would be finished in 1952, that project will now end in 1953 or 1954.

I hope that the Members of the House who have been properly so interested in this matter will read the entire testimony of the officers on the Air Force items. You will make your speeches with the same fervor but with more information. You will not be charging the committee with failing to protest the cutback on the airplane program. You will find that if there had been a slow-down in procurement of $30,000,000 worth of airplanes, it was not the fault of the committee or of Congress.

If there has been any slow-up in the aircraft program of the Nation it has been as a result of the cut-back in the research and development program instituted by the President through the Bureau of the Budget last year. If there is a delay of a year or a year and a half in the development and procurement of the proper type of plane, the responsibility rests with the cut in the money that the Congress appropriated last year.

And if some members of the committee said, "Let us not buy these aircraft too rapidly," it was because they thought that with the research and development program delayed a year to a year and a half we might wait a little bit and get the benefit of some of this research and development incorporated in the planes when we got them. They were honest and sincere in their attitude and any suggestion to the contrary is utterly unwarranted. It would be as unfair and illogical to charge the President with a lack of concern for the welfare of the Nation's Air Forces because of the cutbacks and transfers he proposed through the Budget Bureau last year. Obviously, he or they thought the airplane industry had its hands full and wanted to save the cash position of the Treasury a bit. And so did the members of the committee who looked at the planes on order and on hand and the delay in the research and development program.

Now, then, as far as I am concerned, I am of the same opinion that I was, and I say to the committee that if this money is restored, I would be happy to go along with that decision.

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SCRIVNER The gentleman has done a splendid job in giving us the picture of the airplane program. In view of the statements made clarifying this situation, and in view of the statement made by the chairman this morning, it is clear that some of us were laboring under a misapprehension. As I told the gentleman from Texas in my remarks, if he could show me where I was in error, my mind was open, and I could change it in conformity with that showing. Now, in view of that showing, as far as I am concerned, I can go along with the rest of the gentlemen and concur in the restoration of the $40,000,000 cut.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. As I said, I have no objection to the amendment, and I hope that the chairman of the committee will feel likewise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I want to make this statement clear. On Tuesday, when I spoke, I said that there was $440,000,000 in this bill for planes, including $280,000,000 contract authorization. I was afterward told I was wrong—that the $280,000,000 contract authorization in the bill was in addition to the $440,000,000 for new planes. The committee report so reads. I did not write that part of the report. It was written after the bill had been passed by the full Appropriations Committee. After talking to some of my colleagues, I made the statement on the floor of the House yesterday that the $280,000,000 was not included in the $440,000,000, and took the same position the report did. Later I went over my files and learned that the statement I made on Tuesday was right—that the $440,000,000 allowed for planes did include the $280,000,000 contract authorization. I corrected the statement I made in the House yesterday in revising my remarks. I also called the attention of the House this morning to the correction. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON] was correct in the position he took, and still takes. I have no objection to the amendment going into the bill and accept it.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MAHON. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan is exactly in accord with the facts as I understand them. The gentleman is correct and he has been completely fair about the whole matter.

I want to express my appreciation to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL], my chairman, for the many courtesies extended to me throughout the bill. He deserves the thanks of the Congress for his untiring and able efforts to work out a satisfactory bill. I also thank the gentleman for accepting the amendment which I offered to the bill providing the additional funds for planes.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Does the gentleman recall that the airplane portion of the committee report was written after the original report had been acted upon by the full committee?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; that is right, and there was some confusion, and much haste was required in drafting the supplementary language as to the Air Forces. Moreover, the gentleman from Michigan has been confronted with a stream of witnesses who have been appearing before his committee on another bill now pending, the civil-functions bill.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. I thank the gentleman from Texas for his kind remarks. I also wish to thank him for the splendid cooperation and support he has given me as chairman throughout the long and tedious hearings. He has been and is a most valuable member of my subcommittee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Engineer Service: For the design, development, procurement, manufacture, maintenance, alteration, repair, installation, storage, and issue of engineer equipment, instruments, appliances, supplies, materials, tools and machinery required in the equipment and training of troops and in military operations, including military surveys; operation and maintenance of the Engineer School, including compensation of civilian lecturers, and purchase and binding of scientific and professional books, pamphlets, papers, and periodicals; procurement, preparation, and reproduction of maps and similar data for military purposes; expenses incident to the Engineer Service in military and training operations, including military surveys, and including research and development of improved methods in such operations, rental of storehouses and grounds, and repair and alteration of buildings, including heat, light, power, water, and communication service, not otherwise provided for and expenses of railroad construction, including purchase or lease of equipment and materials, and the acquisition of lands, rights-of-way thereon, and other interests therein and temporary use thereof; $114,512,405.

Mr. MUHLENBERG. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MUHLENBERG: On page 28, line 16, after the semicolon, strike out "$114,512,405" and insert "$123,398,249."

Mr. MUHLENBERG. Mr. Chairman, I have two other amendments, both of which will affect the following paragraphs. I ask unanimous consent that they may be read for information at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. MUHLENBERG: On page 29, line 16, after the comma, strike out "$184,702,101" and insert "$200,000,000."

On page 30, line 6, after the comma, strike out "$299,214,506" and insert "$323,398,249."

Mr. MUHLENBERG. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the three amendments be considered together.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, we do not know what the amendments propose to do or what the funds sought to be added are for, so I shall have to object.

Mr. MUHLENBERG. Mr. Chairman, I invite the attention of the House to the committee report, where on page 14, under "Engineer Service," in the middle of the page there is a subtabulation covering the Caribbean Defense Command, Pacific area, European theater of operations, and so forth, involving a total of something over $8,000,000 of reductions. I believe it is very necessary indeed that this amount of $8,885,854 be restored for the committee is suggesting a cut of 50 percent under estimates of the theater commanders themselves—men who should know for they are on the ground.

The proposed reduction of $3,000,000 in the Caribbean Defense Command will curtail the Central America map program by 40 percent because material and equipment cannot be purchased. It will reduce maintenance operations on all installations within the command by 30 percent and will cut the comprehensive program to rehabilitate deteriorated housing built prior to the war to this extent.

A reduction of $5,000,000 in the Pacific area will eliminate 60 percent of the materials available for the mapping program of Japan and other areas in the Far East and will reduce in a like amount materials and supplies which may be purchased locally for the operation of engineer depots and shops. It will reduce funds available for continuation of rents and leases in the Philippines and Ryukyus Islands by 40 percent. Cost of termination of these leases will be indeterminate at this time and little money may be saved.

In the Pacific command—principally Hawaii, Gilbert, Marshall, and Fiji Islands—52 percent of materials and supplies for operation and maintenance of active installations cannot be purchased with the funds so restricted, and the operation of utilities in the Hawaiian area will also be curtailed at least 20 percent.

Maintenance and operation of Air Force facilities will be reduced directly in proportion to the 50 percent reduction in funds for local procurement, as well as funds for utilities services—light, water, power and equipment repairs, and so forth.

A reduction of $148,484 in the European theater of operations will result in a reduction of 11 percent of the materials and supplies that may be purchased locally for the operation of engineer depots and shops and will to a like extent reduce the activity of personnel performing engineer surveys, studies, and research in the occupied area of Europe. It will further reduce the materials and supplies which can be procured in the nonoccupied countries for maintenance and operations of facilities employed in the occupation and for much-needed rehabilitation of destroyed German property which may be put into service by United States forces.

A reduction of $237,360 in funds for the Atlantic bases will result in the curtailment of maintenance activities and the operation of post utilities by 35 percent throughout the area. A large portion of the funds remaining available following this reduction must be spent in Iceland because it is imperative that United States installations in that country be maintained at an extremely high standard in order to insure a satisfactory reaction by the Government of Iceland and a continuation of our short-term agreement. I sincerely believe these funds should be restored and ask passage of the amendment.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the total cut in this part of the appropriation is $21,487,000, including $6,822,000 for civilian personnel. A number of these cuts were agreed to by the Army engineers budget officer. Out of $8,000,000 for mapping for the engineers, we only cut off $140,000, according to our figures. The total cut is between 7 percent and 8 percent on this item.

I ask that the House stand with the committee on that cut.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MUHLENBERG].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Barracks and quarters, Army: For expenses necessary for the maintenance, installation, repair, operation, protection, and rental of buildings, structures, grounds, utilities, flying fields, fortifications, and appurtenances thereto, or other facilities required for military use, including the procurement of supplies, equipment, fuel, printing, binding, communication services, at the seat of government and elsewhere; manufacture, procurement, purchase, storage, issue, and transportation (including research, planning, design, development, inspection, tests, and the handling) of water, gas, electricity, fuel, tools, machinery, and equipment; construction of additions and extensions to and alterations, improvements, and rehabilitations of existing facilities; the furnishing of heat and light for buildings erected at private cost, in the operation of the act approved May 31, 1902 (10 U. S. C. 1346), and buildings on military reservations, authorized by War Department regulations to be used for a similar purpose; expenses, including relocation costs and rental of buildings and offices, for other Government agencies, not otherwise provided for, necessitated by their vacation of Government-owned or other property for Army use; and expenses of packing and crating and unpacking and uncrating of equipment, material, supplies, baggage, and goods not otherwise provided for, $184,702,101: Provided, That the amounts to be assessed and collected from nonmilitary interests on the Fort Monroe Military Reservation, Va., for expenditure in the maintenance, repair, and operation of wharves, roads, sewerage systems, and other utilities at said reservation shall be fixed by the Secretary of War during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948, in proportion to the service rendered to such nonmilitary interests: Provided further, That no part of the funds herein appropriated shall be available for construction of a permanent nature of an additional building or an extension or addition to an existing building, the cost of which in any case exceeds $20,000: Provided further, That the monthly rental rate to be paid out of this appropriation for stabling any animal shall not exceed $15;

Mr. MUHLENBERG. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which is at the Clerk's desk.

Amendment offered by Mr. MUHLENBERG: On page 29, line 16, after the comma, strike out the sum "$184,702,101" and insert "$200,000,000."

Mr. MUHLENBERG. Mr. Chairman, in connection with my second amendment covering a partial restoration of funds under "Barracks and quarters" cut by the committee, I invite attention to the fact that the chairman of the committee has just said that none of the reductions mentioned before were approved by the engineer budget officer. I should like to call your attention to the fact that practically all the items that are reduced are cut so much that the engineer service cannot, in my opinion, handle the work satisfactorily or economically or to the best interests of taxpayers or troops.

Certain items cannot be cut. Thus, all savings must come out of a few items. Fuel handling is a standard amount and cannot be cut. The total cost remains at $22,500,000.

Leased facilities remain at $21,000,000, whether the total is cut or not.

Seacoast defense remains at $250,000.

Care of inactive camps will have to be cut to $8,788,520, which is only 50 percent of the normal amount.

Utilities in a sum of $40,650,000 cannot be cut, either.

Fire protection will have to be cut to $19,000,000. That is a tremendous cut over and above what it should be. It plainly increases the risk in inactive camps.

The maintenance item cannot be cut below $33,000,000. It leaves an amount of $28,543,000 for maintenance and repair of all buildings and facilities in all other installations in the Army.

I believe that the logical thing to do, if we are ever to maintain our installations sensibly and on a minimum basis, is to increase this by the lump sum that I have asked for, which is a compromise between the amount asked for by the engineers and the too low amount allowed by the committee. It is true that by your vote on the last amendment you have cut the overseas work by the Corps of Engineers by something over $8,000,000. I ask now that you at least give the engineers a reasonable sum to work with on the domestic installations which house and care for our Army.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this cut amounts to $44,297,000, of which $24,297,000 is for civilian personnel and $20,000,000 is from other items. The engineers have in this budget over $14,000,000 for administration overhead charges, they have added to the cost; as high as 14.75 percent for overhead. We did not take shop repair into consideration. We did feel the overhead was high and I think the reduction made is absolutely fair. We ask the House to stand by the committee.

Mr. MUHLENBERG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. MUHLENBERG. Approximately half of what you call overhead is shop expense.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. No; I beg your pardon. Shop expense is a separate item of overhead. The $14,000,000 is purely administrative overhead. I can show the gentleman right here. Here is an item, barracks and quarters, building roads; 14.39 percent added for administrative overhead. Over here they have shop expense overhead separate, in addition to 14¾ percent for administrative overhead; the total overhead, exclusive of shop expense, is between fourteen and fifteen million dollars.

Mr. MUHLENBERG. I am afraid the gentleman is a little bit confused.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. I am not. There is no question about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I only want a minute on this item.

In the middle of the State of California is a place known as Muroc Dry Lake. It is a flat, dry lake bed 3½ miles wide and 13½ miles long. An airplane can land on any part of it. When the Army Air Forces receive a prototype airplane they take it out to this place to test in flight, because if anything goes wrong, the plane can be landed anywhere on the lake bed and the plane itself is saved. No runways are required. It is a very convenient place for testing purposes and it has saved many millions of dollars' worth of airplanes from destruction, because they could land and roll as far as necessary before coming to a stop.

The buildings on this place built by the Army Air Forces were built for 5 years' life. They were built there early in the war period. The 5 years are up and the buildings are almost down. They are about to fall apart. My committee went out there recently to look at the new types of jet aircraft. We found that the buildings were practically falling apart. They were built of tar paper and boards, and the tar paper was peeling off and the boards were rotting. The temperature at this place runs up as high as 110 or 120 degrees in the summertime. You might be able to get boys to stay out there during the wartime when the importance of war was in their minds, but in peacetime it is pretty hard to get them to live in that atmosphere and in those temperatures. In the winter it is cold.

I should like to know from the committee whether or not they have considered this particular place and the importance of doing something about its permanence.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Muroc Lake?

Mr. HINSHAW. Yes.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. There are some 1,300 installations, Mr. Chairman, of various types in the United States, permanent installations. They are trying to reduce the number. I know the project of which the gentleman speaks. I personally think it is a worthy project; but as far as the committee's going to the War Department and telling them to continue one installation and discontinue another, that is beyond the province of the committee.

Mr. HINSHAW. I do not expect that. I only wanted to know whether there was any discussion with the War Department concerning the desirability of putting some reasonably permanent living quarters in that area for the men who work there.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. The Muroc Lake site was bought a number of years ago when Mr. Dockweiler, of California, was a member of the subcommittee. I recall it perfectly. It is a wonderful place for experimental purposes, particularly with guided missiles and long-range guns, and I think it should be developed. It is my judgment that it should be developed, and I believe it is likewise the judgment of the committee.

Mr. HINSHAW. I appreciate the gentleman's explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MUHLENBERG. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my third amendment, which really only changes the titles.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For manufacture, procurement, storage, and issue, including research, planning, design, development, inspection, test, alteration, maintenance, repair, and handling of ordnance material, together with the machinery, supplies, and services necessary thereto; supplies and services in connection with the general work of the Ordnance Department, comprising police and office duties, rents, tolls, fuel, light, water, advertising, stationery, typewriting and computing machines, including their exchange, and furniture, tools, and instruments of service; instruction, training, and other incidental expenses of the ordnance service; purchase and hire of passenger motor vehicles; ammunition for military salutes at Government establishments and institutions to which the issues of arms for salutes are authorized; services, material, tools, and appliances for operation of the testing machines and chemical laboratory in connection therewith; publications for libraries of the Ordnance Department, including the Ordnance Office: Provided, That not more than $25,000,000 of the amounts received by the War Department during the fiscal year 1948 as proceeds from the sale of scrap or salvage material shall be available for expenses of transportation, demilitarization, and other preparation for sale or salvage of military supplies, equipment, and matériel: Provided further, That a report of receipts and disbursements under this limitations shall be made quarterly to the Appropriation Committees of the Congress; $244,381,771.

Mr. DEVITT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, for the purposes of asking a question, I would like to invite the attention of the chairman of the subcommittee and the Members of the House to the operations of the Twin Cities Arsenal, at St. Paul, Minn.

For the last 8 months this plant has been exclusively engaged in the demilitarization or break-down of .30- and .50-caliber cartridges and the segregation and salvage of critical materials, such as brass, copper, lead, and other miscellaneous metals. The operation has been very successful; in fact, it is unique in our military history because it is a profit-making venture. The plant has shown a net profit to the Government of $155,000 in this short period of time. To my knowledge no other venture in history under the auspices of the Military Establishment has resulted in bringing money into the Federal Treasury. Normally, moneys for military purposes follow a single outward track. It is interesting to note that a ton of packed ammunition will yield approximately the following quantities and materials:

Nine hundred and seventy-eight pounds of brass.

Thirty-four pounds of heavy scrap steel.

Two hundred pounds of wood.

Two hundred and thirty-five pounds of unusable powder.

Two hundred and three pounds of lead.

Sixty pounds of light steel scrap.

Two hundred and ninety pounds of miscellaneous paper and textiles.

At present prices these scrap materials will yield approximately $158 a ton. The salvage operation costs approximately $50 per ton. This leaves a net profit to the Government of more than $100 a ton. And what a boon this much-needed scrap is to American industry. The War Department contemplated the closing of this very profitable and worth-while venture because, it was said, there was no appropriation to continue its operation, and Federal manpower-ceiling laws prohibited the manning of the plant under present ceilings.

Through the farsighted understanding and appreciation of the gentleman from Michigan, Chairman ENGEL, of the Appropriations Subcommittee, both of these objections have been met. The bill under consideration, on page 31, without appropriating new moneys, establishes a fund for the deposit of the profits of this operation and from which the expenses may be paid. The net profit goes into the Treasury. Section 16, on page 57 of the bill, specifically exempts the manpower-ceiling provisions of the law with reference to operations of this kind.

The action of the subcommittee therefore provides for the continued operation of this plant with its unique and successful system of salvaging ammunition at a profit during the fiscal year 1948.

I have asked for this time in order to commend the gentlman from Michigan, Chairman ENGEL, and his subcommittee for their action in this regard, and to ask the chairman if I have not correctly stated the facts and the intent of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. The gentleman has.

Mr. DEVITT. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. The Ordnance Department alone has 100,000 tons of steel scrap that they can obtain through demilitarizing ammunition and equipment. They also have 50,000 tons of nonferrous metals, zinc, brass, and copper scrap. I have estimated that that 150,000 tons of scrap which we can obtain is worth from twenty to twenty-five million dollars. Scrap is a very critical item and commands a very high price. That is only one department. There is a section in the bill permitting the Army to demilitarize this old ammunition, break down this scrap and sell it while the prices are high, get rid of it and save storage. It is for that purpose a provision was put into the bill. It is legislation, but it was placed into the bill with the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. This work is very much worth while from both the financial point of view and from the point of view of getting this scrap back into industry where it is so badly needed.

Mr. DEVITT. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL GUARD

For expenses necessary for equipping, maintaining, operating, and training the National Guard, including expenses of camps, airfields, storage facilities and alterations and additions to present structures either on Government-owned or State-owned land, construction and maintenance of buildings, structures, rifle ranges, and facilities, the hire (at a rate not exceeding $1 per diem) of passenger automobiles, and the modification, repair, maintenance and operation of airplanes; transportation of things; personal services at the seat of government or elsewhere (including services of personnel of the National Guard employed as civilians, without regard to their military rank) necessary for the care, maintenance, modification and repair of materials and equipment, for Federal property and custodial accounting work, and for administrative and such other duties as may be required; medical and hospital treatment of members of the National Guard who suffer injury or contract disease in line of duty and other expenses connected therewith as authorized by the act of June 15, 1936 (10 U. S. C. 455); pay at a rate not less than $2,400 per annum and travel of property and disbursing officers for the United States; attendance of National Guard personnel at military service schools and expenses of enlisted men of the Regular Army on duty with the National Guard, including allowances for quarters and subsistence; drill pay of the National Guard; travel of personnel of the Regular Army detailed to or on duty with the National Guard, including mileage, transportation of dependents, and transportation, packing, crating and unpacking of household goods and effects; procurement and issue to the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia of military equipment and supplies, as provided by law, including motor-propelled vehicles and airplanes, and repair and modification of such equipment and supplies; $110,000,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to issue to the National Guard without charge against this appropriation except for actual expenses incident to such issue, supplies and equipment from surplus or excess supplies or equipment purchased for the Army: Provided further, That the number of caretakers authorized to be employed for any one unit, pool, or heavier-than-air squadron under the provisions of section 90 of the National Defense Act of June 3, 1916, as amended, may be such as is deemed necessary by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That not to exceed $25,500 of this appropriation shall be available for the settlement of claims (not exceeding $500 in any one case) for damages to or loss of private property incident to the operation of camps of instruction, either during the stay of National Guard units in such camps or while en route thereto or therefrom.

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, as a veteran and a member of the New York National Guard for many years, I am in wholehearted support of this provision of the bill pertaining to the support of the National Guard of the United States.

First, let me extend my own thanks and those of thousands of guardsmen throughout our country who are vitally interested in our citizen soldiery to the members of the committee having charge of this bill for their painstaking efforts and their many weeks of patient and sympathetic understanding in arriving at a figure which would adequately care for the necessary expenses in equipping, maintaining, operating, and training these patriotic men of the guard who devote many hours weekly in the service of their State and Nation and to be frank, let us say, receive little thanks for their efforts—from some quarters.

I believe in the National Guard—the guard of the past and the guard of the future. If the guard can receive the cooperation from the War Department that under the law it is supposed to receive—I know that it can be all that it is intended to be—a force of some 600,000 men trained to the limit and ready to take its place as combat troops, if the need should ever again rise.

The amount sought in this section is not too high and in view of the testimony given before the committee by those individuals of the guard, I see no obstacle in the path of its adoption.

Too much credit cannot be given to the committee by the president of the National Guard Association of the United States, Maj. Gen. Ellard Walsh, of Minnesota, and Maj. Gen. Milton A. Reckord, of Maryland, both the adjutant generals of their respective States. Both of these gentlemen with distinguished war and peace records have devoted many years of their lives in order to properly present to the Congress and the people of our country the necessity for a well-trained and equipped National Guard.

The story of the guard and its service to our country is an old one and a historic one. During every war our country has been engaged in, the volunteer citizen regiments and divisions of the guard have won for themselves an enviable place in the military achievements of our Nation's armed forces. The Revolution, the War Between the States, the Spanish-American War, World War I, and World War II saw troops from every State of our country on the fighting front and proved again and again the worth and value of the National Guard.

Given the required and necessary amount of cooperation from the War Department, the necessary and worth-while equipment, competent instructors and adequate field training, it will again become a tower of strength to our country and ready and able to take its place on the fighting front, if ever again called upon.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the appropriations made in this act shall be available for pay, allowances, or traveling or other expenses of any officer or enlisted man of the National Guard who may be drawing a pension, disability allowance, disability compensation, or retired pay (where retirement has been made on account of physical disability or age) from the Government of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as barring the continuance of adjutants general in a federally recognized status without pay under this act.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to pay tribute to one of the outstanding men who served during the recent war. On yesterday the gentleman from Texas paid a high tribute to a general, and I want to call attention at this time to a man who I believe has one of the most outstanding records of this entire war. I refer to Maj. Gen. Norman T. Kirk, who retired a few days ago. We are all aware of the job he did. His record speaks for itself. We hate to lose him, but he has retired and I hope he will enjoy his vacation because he deserves it, he has earned it.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. THOMASON. I want to join my colleague in paying a just and deserving tribute to Major General Kirk. The gentleman who has the floor, and a number of others in this Congress who composed the House Military Affairs Committee, had much business with General Kirk. He appeared before the committee on many occasions. He is a great officer, he is a magnificent surgeon, and a fine citizen. I not only join in the commendation that my friend from North Carolina gives to General Kirk but also to make the prediction as to his successor, General Bliss, for many years associated with the Beaumont General Hospital in El Paso, Tex., a man who stands high in his profession, that he will have a very magnificent, efficient administration.

Mr. DURHAM. I thank the gentleman very much.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. The foregoing appropriations for "Quartermaster Service, Army," "Signal Service of the Army," "Air Corps, Army," "Medical and Hospital Department," "Engineer Service, Army," "Ordnance service and supplies," and "Chemical Service, Army" shall each be available for the pay and allowances, including travel allowances, of such Reserve officers as the President may, with their consent, order to active duty for such periods, not in excess of 2 years, as their service may be required in the procurement or production of equipment therein appropriated for, or on duty pertaining to aviation.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FORAND: On page 49 following the period in line 2 insert the following new section:

"SEC. 2-A. No part of the appropriations made in this act shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop watch, or other time-measuring device, a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work, nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premiums or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except as may be otherwise authorized in this act."

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that the Committee will accept this amendment. It is not anything new. It is a provision that has been carried in the appropriation bill for the Navy as well as the appropriation bill for the War Department for 30 years. It is a prohibition against a shop-management practice that is commonly known as the Taylor system. It prohibits the use of stop watches in estimating the time taken by an individual in a given operation. It was tried in some of the private concerns years ago, and management found that it created so much trouble, so much confusion, so much disagreement, in fact, so much opposition by labor that it was abandoned and is now considered an unfair labor practice by many employers as well as by workers.

I am told that neither the War Department nor the Navy Department intend to use such a system on the men; in fact, they do not care to use the other phase of the Taylor system, that of paying a bonus to one of these so-called leaders or pace setters within the shop. The so-called leader is usually the man of greatest ability in the shop. His operations are clocked, and then his production record is considered to be the average. Now, you know and I know that many individual workmen are faster than others, and the faster man, with a smaller amount of effort, can produce more than another man who is not quite so skilled, not quite so facile at adjusting himself to the operation, but yet that slower man might be devoting a great deal more energy in accomplishing his task. This type of operation is bad.

This legislation has been on the books since 1913, and I see no good reason why it should not be continued at this time. For that reason I respectfully ask the committee to accept the amendment.

As part of my remarks and under permission already granted me, I include the following Senate Report No. 930, Sixty-second Congress, second session, which was presented in the Senate by Senator Borah on July 17, 1912, together with the record cards used under the Taylor system.

This sets forth clearly and in detail what this oppressive Taylor system actually is.

SYSTEMS OF SHOP MANAGEMENT

[July 17, 1912.—Ordered to be printed]

Mr. Borah, from the Committee on Education and Labor, submitted the following report [to accompany S. 6172]:

The Committee on Education and Labor, having had under consideration Senate bill 6172, report the same favorably with amendments and recommend its passage.

The amendments are as follows:

Page 1, in line 7, after the word "movements", insert the words "between the starting and completion of any job."

Page 1, in line 8, strike out the comma after the word "employee" and insert a period. Then strike out all after the word "employee" on page 1, line 8, down to and including the word "law", on page 1, line 12, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "No premium or bonus or cash reward shall be paid to any employee, except."

The terms of this bill (S. 6172) and the practices which it is intended to prohibit are directed against the excesses of certain systems of shop management which it is the intention of the War Department and the Navy Department to install in their manufacturing establishments and which we believe to be oppressive to workmen, as they have a tendency to reduce the employee to a mere machine, deprive him of his self-reliance, and in the long run would reduce Government employees to a condition of unresisting vassalage.

There are several systems of shop management now upon the market which have been invented by efficiency engineers. They are severally known as the Taylor system, the Stimpson system, the Emerson system, the Gantt system, etc., all of which have practically the same basic principles of operation but which differ somewhat as to details. When spoken of without reference to any one particular system, their authors prefer to have them be known by the generic term of "scientific management."

Many of those systems have much in them that is commendable and proper, since a large portion of their details consists of a compilation of business methods and shop practice which have proven successful and not harmful to the workman; such as the proper grouping of machines; standardizing tools and equipment and methods of doing work, elimination of waste, modern methods of issuing materials and cost keeping, etc. On the other hand, in the effort to get the utmost amount of work out of the employees, excesses are committed which should be curbed.

The Taylor system of shop management being the system decided upon by the War Department as the one to be used in their manufacturing establishments as well as the one originally intended for use by the Navy Department, and since this is the system against which objection has been raised by the employees, it would serve the purpose of outlining the principles of so-called scientific management to have an outline here given of the workings of this particular system of shop management.

The authority from which this outline is compiled is a treatise, Shop Management, by F. W. Taylor, being a paper read before the American Society of Mechanical Engineers; and the author, for the purpose of making the application of his system clear and specific, has taken the class of work done in a machine shop with which to illustrate.

Under the Taylor system the management of the shop is divided into two departments, known as the planning department and the executive department.

The duties of the planning department, which is supposed to do as much of the brain work of the establishment as it is possible to do there, are as follows:

"The following are the leading functions of the planning department:

"A. The complete analysis of all orders for machines or work taken by the company.

"B. Time study for all work done by hand throughout the works, including that done in setting the work in machines, and all bench work, vise work, and transportation, etc.

"C. Time study for all operations done by the various machines.

"D. The balance of all materials, raw materials, stores, and finished parts, and the balance of the work ahead for each class of machines and workmen.

"E. The analysis of all inquiries for new work received in the sales department and promises for time and delivery.

"F. The cost of all items manufactured, with complete expense analysis and complete monthly comparative cost and expense exhibits.

"G. The pay department.

"H. The menmonic symbol system for identification of parts and for charges.

"I. Information bureau.

"J. Standards.

"K. Maintenance of system and plant and use of the tickler.

"L. Messenger system and post-office delivery.

"M. Employment bureau.

"N. The shop disciplinarian.

"O. A mutual accident-insurance association.

"P. Rush-order department.

"Q. Improvement of system or plant." (Par. 258, p. 1398.)

The duties of the executive department which is managed by a large supervising force, consists of performing the work of the shop according to the directions of the planning department.

One of the leading features of the Taylor system is functional foremanship.

The employees each are under the direction of eight foremen, who have jurisdiction over different parts of their duties, and are as follows:

In the shop they have the gang boss, speed boss, inspector, and repair boss. Their duties are sufficiently explained by their designation.

In the planning department there are four bosses who have jurisdiction over the men in the shop as to all questions touching their special duties. They are order of work or route clerk, instruction-card man, time and cost clerk, and shop disciplinarian.

All directions to the workmen as to what work to do, what machines to use, and the details as to methods and time allowed for doing work emanate from the planning department in the form of an instruction card covering these details. A sample instruction card is appended hereto:

In the selection of a working force it is the purpose of this type of management to displace as rapidly as possible the high class of workmen ordinarily employed on such work with common laborers, who are cheaper and are glad to earn a little more than formerly, even though it is not so much as was earned by the mechanic whom they displace. This desired achievement is not always attainable, however, and depends upon the condition of the labor market.

This principle of the elimination of high-priced help also applies to the bosses.

It is also proposed to stimulate the activity of the employees by offering premiums and bonuses ranging from 30 percent to 100 percent more than was formerly earned by the employees in order to induce them to reach the daily task that is set. That is, if a machinist getting $3 per day is displaced by a laborer getting $1.50 per day, the laborer gets from 30 to 100 percent more per day than he formerly received if he succeeds in completing his task.

In setting tasks, the most capable workmen are used. When it is desired to ascertain how long it should take to do a given job, the time-study man takes observations of one of the fastest workmen who has been selected for the purpose, and notes the time it takes by means of a stop watch to do each of the elementary operations of the job. All of these elements or unit times are added, and the resulting time is supposed to be the standard time for that job.

Thus (par. 101 of Shop Management, p. 1358):

"His first step was to place an intelligent, college-educated man in charge of progress in this line. This man had not before handled this class of labor, although he understood managing workmen. He was not familiar with the methods pursued by the writer, but was soon taught the art of determining how much work a first-class man can do in a day. This was done by timing with a stop watch a first-class man while he was working fast. The best way to do this, in fact, almost the only way in which the timing can be done with certainty, is to divide the man's work into its elements and time each element separately. For example, in the case of a man loading pig iron onto a car, the elements should be: Picking up the pig iron from the ground or pile (time in hundredths of a minute). Walking with it on a level (time per foot walked). Walking with it up an incline to car (time per foot walked). Throwing the pig iron down (time in hundredths of a minute), or laying it on a pile (time in hundredths of a minute). Walking back empty to get a load (time per foot walked)."

The problem of inducing the employees to work at the pace required is solved first by offering a bonus or premium to those who succeed and if this does not get results other more drastic means are used.

It is the business of the shop disciplinarian to see that a system of discipline is in vogue and enforced that is adequate to induce everyone to make sure that his part of the work comes in on schedule time. The system of discipline advocated by Mr. Taylor consists of—

1. Lowering the man's wages.
2. Laying him off for a period of time.
3. Fining him all the way from 1 cent to $60.
4. Discharging him.

It is also regarded as a good plan to continually keep enough men on hand so as to be able to discharge a workman every now and then for failing to continue at the pace required because of its moral effect on the rest of the workmen.

When the system is first installed the high speed cannot immediately be attained. It must be worked up to gradually, and therefore the kind of bonus system used is as drastic as the degree of perfection to which the system has attained will permit.

The gradual acceleration of the speed at which the workmen labor is accomplished by the premium and bonus above referred to, the system of discipline, and by the gradual elimination of the workmen who are unable to keep up to the rising standards of performance.

The system of bonuses now in vogue at the Watertown Arsenal, where the Taylor system has not yet reached an advanced stage, is as follows (see Annual Report of the Chief of Ordnance for fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, p. 17):

"For example, a workman has been doing a piece of work in 190 minutes. After painstaking study of the job and of all the means of saving time, the man is carefully instructed as to these means, and is told that for every minute saved, within, say, 120 minutes, he will be paid for half a minute at his regular rate, in addition to his regular daily pay, and that it is thought that he can do the work in 72 minutes, for which time the increase over his regular pay will amount to 33½ percent."

When the system has reached an advanced stage of perfection, Mr. Taylor advocates the substitution of this kind of bonus plan for another one which is more drastic, wherever possible. This latter is known as the "differential rate," and is illustrated by the following:

If it is discovered that the maximum number of pieces of work which a first-class workman can do in a day is 10, he will receive 35 cents apiece provided he completes all 10 of them. If, however, he should fail to complete the 10 pieces, even if this task is missed by only 10 minutes, he would get only 25 cents apiece for all of them, thus making the workman's wage for the day only $2.50, instead of $3.50, for running behind 10 minutes on his schedule time. This arrangement furnishes him a powerful incentive to work at his utmost.

The Taylor system further insists upon dealing with the workmen individually, and dealing with labor organizations being regarded as inconsistent with the purpose and workings of the system.

To further increase efficiency, the movements of the workmen are closely studied and standardized so as to make every movement on the part of the workman count toward increased production.

In order to further elucidate the basic principles of these systems and to ascertain the motives which have suggested their provisions and the possible extent to which they could be carried out if unrestricted, we give below extracts from the Treatise on Shop Management, by F. W. Taylor, which it appears is regarded as a sort of textbook on the subject, and from which the outline above given was deducted. The substance of this publication, which was written prior to the investigation of these systems by a special committee of the House of Representatives last winter, was defended both in whole and in part by its author at the hearings, no part of it being repudiated. Hence, its aims and purposes shall still be regarded as the essence of scientific management. Quotations are as follows:

UNIT TIME STUDY NECESSARY

"What the writer wishes particularly to emphasize is that this whole system rests upon an accurate and scientific study of unit times, which is by far the most important element in modern management. With it greater and more permanent results can be attained, even under ordinary day work or piecework, than can be reached under any of the more elaborate systems without it." (Par. 133, p. 1364.)

QUICKEST TIME IS STANDARD TIME

"For each job there is the quickest time in which it can be done by a first-class man. This time may be called the quickest time, or the standard time for the job.

"Under all the ordinary systems this quickest time is more or less completely shrouded in mist. In most cases, however, the workman is nearer to it and sees it more clearly than the employer." (Pars. 136–137, p. 1365.)

ORDINARY SYSTEMS NOT FAST ENOUGH

"The injustice of the very foundation of the system is thus forced upon the workman every day of his life, and no man, however kindly disposed he may be toward his employer, can fail to resent this and be seriously influenced by it in his work. These systems are, therefore, of necessity slow and irregular in their operation in reducing costs. They drift gradually toward an increased output, but under them the attainment of the maximum output of a first-class man is almost impossible." (Par. 90, p. 1355.)

STOP-WATCH TIME STUDY USED

"His first step was to place an intelligent, college-educated man in charge of progress in this line. This man had not before handled this class of labor, although he understood managing workmen. He was not familiar with the methods pursued by the writer, but was soon taught the art of determining how much work a first-class man can do in a day. This was done by timing with a stop watch a first-class man while he was working fast. The best way to do this, in fact almost the only way in which the timing can be done with certainty, is to divide the man's work into its elements and time each element separately. For example, in the case of a man loading pig iron onto a car, the elements should be: Picking up the pig iron from the ground or pile (time in hundredths of a minute). Walking with it on a level (time per foot walked). Walking with it up an incline to car (time per foot walked). Throwing the pig down (time in hundredths of a minute), or laying it on a pile (time in hundredths of a minute). Walking back empty to get a load (time per foot walked)." (Par. 101, p. 1358.)

ONLY ONE OUT OF FIVE CAN KEEP UP TO TASK

"When the writer left the steel works, the Bethlehem piece workers were the finest body of picked laborers that he has ever seen together. They were practically all first-class men because in each case the task which they were called upon to perform was such that only a first-class man could do it. The tasks were all purposely made so severe that not more than one out of five laborers (perhaps even a smaller percentage than this) could keep up." (Par. 125, p. 1361.)

ONLY TEMPERATE WORKMEN COULD STAND PACE

"A careful inquiry into the condition of these men when away from work developed the fact that out of the whole gang only two were said to be drinking men. This does not, of course, imply that many of them did not take an occasional drink. The fact is that a steady drinker would find it almost impossible to keep up with the pace which was set, so that they were practically all sober." (Par. 128, p. 1363.)

A LARGE DAILY TASK SET

"Each man in the establishment, high or low, should daily have a clearly defined task laid out before him. This task should not in the least degree be vague nor indefinite, but should be circumscribed carefully and completely, and should not be easy to accomplish." (Par. 149, p. 1368.)

"When an establishment has reached an advanced state of organization, in many cases a fifth element should be added, namely, the task should be made so difficult that it can only be accomplished by a first-class man." (Par. 153, p. 1368.)

LARGE TASK ENFORCED BY OBJECT LESSON OF LAYING OFF WORKMEN

"Where the labor market is large enough to secure, in a reasonable time, enough strictly first-class men, the piecework rates should be fixed on such a basis that only a first-class man working at his best can earn the average amount called for. This figure should be, in the case of first-class men, as stated above, from 30 percent to 100 percent beyond the wages usually paid. The task idea is emphasized with this style of piecework by two things: The high wages and the laying off, after a reasonable trial, of incompetent men; and for the success of the system, the number of men employed on practically the same class of work should be large enough for the workmen quite often to have the object lesson of seeing men laid off for failing to earn high wages and others substituted in their places." (Par. 166, p. 1374.)

THE "DIFFERENTIAL-RATE PIECEWORK" IS MOST FORCEFUL, AND SHOULD BE USED WHERE POSSIBLE

"'The differential-rate piecework' is rather simpler in its application, and is the more forceful of the two. It should be used wherever it is practicable, but in no case until after all the accompanying conditions have been perfected and completely standardized and a thorough time study has been made of all of the elements of the work. This system is particularly useful where the same kind of work is repeated day after day, and also whenever the maximum possible output is desired, which is almost always the case in the operation of expensive machinery or of a plant occupying valuable ground or a large building. It is more forceful than 'task work with a bonus,' because it not only pulls the man up from the top but pushes him equally hard from the bottom." (Par. 170, p. 1375.)

IN ORDER TO MAINTAIN RAPID PACE, WORKMEN SHOULD BE ABLE FREQUENTLY TO SEE IF THEY ARE FALLING BEHIND

"In fixing the times for the tasks and the piecework rates in jobs of this class the job should be subdivided into a number of divisions, and a separate time and price assigned to each division rather than to assign a single time and price for the whole job. Thus for several reasons, the most important of which is that the average workman, in order to maintain a rapid pace, should be given the opportunity of measuring his performance against the task set him at frequent intervals. Many men are incapable of looking very far ahead, but if they see a definite opportunity of earning so many cents by working hard for so many minutes, they will avail themselves of it." (Par. 189, p. 1380.)

WORKMEN CAN DO TWO OR THREE TIMES AS MUCH WORK AS IN THE PAST

"Second. As a result of this change of feeling such an increase in their determination and physical activity, and such an improvement in the conditions under which the work is done, will result in many cases in their turning out from two to three times as much work as they have done in the past." (Par. 291, p. 1411.)

SOME MEN WILL BE UNABLE TO KEEP UP PACE UNDER SYSTEM; THESE MUST GO

"Second. After the men acquiesce in the new order of things and are willing to do their part toward cheapening production, it will take time for them to change from their old easy-going ways to a higher rate of speed and to learn to stay steadily at their work, think ahead, and make every minute count. A certain percentage of them, with the best of intentions, will fail in this and find that they have no place in the new organization, while still others, and among them some of the best workers, who are, however, either stupid or stubborn, can never be made to see that the new system is as good as the old; and these, too, must drop out." (Par. 293, p. 1412.)

SPEED GRADUALLY ACCELERATED—WORKMEN AT FIRST RESENT INTERFERENCE

"In reaching the final high rate of speed which shall be steadily maintained, the broad fact should be realized that the men must pass through several distinct phases, rising from one plane of efficiency to another until the final level is reached. First they must be taught to work under an improved system of day work. Each man must learn how to give up his own particular way of doing things, adapt his methods to the many new standards, and grow accustomed to receiving and obeying directions covering details large and small which in the past have been left to his individual judgment. At first the workmen can see nothing in all this but red tape and useless and impertinent interference, and time must be allowed them to recover from their irritation, not only at this but at every stage in their upward march." (Par. 295, p. 1413.)

WHAT IS MEANT BY HIGH WAGES

"By high wages he means wages which are high only with relation to the average of the class to which the man belongs and which are paid only to those who do much more or better work than the average of their class. He would not for an instant advocate the use of a high-priced tradesman to do the work which could be done by a trained laborer or a low-priced man." (Par. 37, p. 1347.)

USING HELPERS TO DO MECHANICS' WORK COMMENDED

"As a rule, the fewer the men employed by the contractor and the smaller the variety of the work the greater will be the success under the contract system, the reason for this being that the contractor, under the spur of financial necessity, makes personally so close a study of the quickest time in which the work can be done that soldiering on the part of his men becomes difficult and the best of them teach laborers or low-priced helpers to do the work formerly done by mechanics." (Par. 67, p. 1352.)

"The objections to the contract system are that the machine tools used by the contractor are apt to deteriorate rapidly, his chief interest being to get a large output, whether the tools are properly cared for or not, and that through the ignorance and inexperience of the contractor in handling men. Its employees are frequently unjustly treated." (Par. 68, p. 1352.)

"These disadvantages are, however, more than counterbalanced by the comparative absence of soldiering on the part of the men." (Par. 69, p. 1352.)

"The full possibilities of functional foremanship, however, will not have been realized until almost all of the machines in the shop are run by men who are of smaller caliber and attainments and who are, therefore, cheaper than those required under the old system. The adoption of standard tools, appliances, and methods throughout the shop, the planning done in the planning room, and the detailed instructions sent them from this department, added to the direct help received from the four executive bosses, permit the use of comparatively cheap men even on complicated work. Of the men in the machine shop of the Bethlehem Steel Co. engaged in running the roughing machines, and who were working under the bonus system when the writer left them, about 95 percent were handy men trained up from laborers. And on the finishing machines, working on bonus, about 25 percent were handy men." (Par. 247, p. 1395.)

DISPLACING SKILLED LABOR WITH UNSKILLED

"It is true, for instance, that the planning room and functional foremanship render it possible for an intelligent laborer or helper in time to do much of the work now done by a machinist. Is not this a good thing for the laborer and helper? He is given a higher class of work, which tends to develop him and gives him better wages. In the sympathy for the machinist the case of the laborer is overlooked." (Par. 319, p. 1421.)

CHANGING FROM ONE BONUS SYSTEM TO ANOTHER AS SYSTEM DEVELOPS

"Mr. Gantt's system is especially useful during the difficult and delicate period of transition from the slow pace of ordinary day work to the high speed which is the leading characteristic of good management. During this period of transition in the past a time was always reached when a sudden long leap was taken from improved day work to some form of piecework, and in making this jump many good men inevitably fell and were lost from the procession. Mr. Gantt's system bridges over this difficult stretch and enables the workman to go smoothly and with gradually accelerated speed from the slower pace of improved day work to the high speed of the new system." (Par. 172, p. 1376.)

"No workman can be expected to do a piece of work the first time as fast as he will later. It should also be recognized that it takes a certain time for men who have worked at the ordinary slow rate of speed to change to high speed. Mr. Gantt's plan can be adapted to meet both of these conditions by allowing the workman to take a longer time to do the job at first and yet earn his bonus, and later compelling him to finish the job in the quickest time in order to get the premium." (Par. 174, p. 1377.)

ALL FOUR SYSTEMS OF PAYING FOR WORK CAN BE USED IN LARGE PLANTS

"It is clear, then, that in carrying out the task idea after the required knowledge has been obtained through a study of 'unit times,' each of the four systems, 'day work,' 'straight piece work,' 'task work with a bonus,' and 'differential piecework,' has its especial field of usefulness, and that in every large establishment doing a variety of work all four of these plans can and should be used at the same time. Three of these systems were in use at the Bethlehem Steel Co. when the writer left there, and the fourth would have soon been started if he had remained." (Par. 177, p. 1378.)

EXAMPLE OF HOW DIFFERENTIAL RATE SYSTEM WORKS

"The first case in which a differential rate was applied during the year 1884 furnishes a good illustration of what can be accomplished by it. A standard steel forging, many thousands of which are used each year, had for several years been turned at the rate of from four to five per day under the ordinary system of piecework, 50 cents per piece being the price for the work. After analyzing the job, and determining the shortest time required to do each of the elementary operations of which it was composed, and then summing up the total, the writer became convinced that it was possible to turn 10 pieces a day. To finish the forgings at this rate, however, the machinists were obliged to work at their maximum pace from morning to night, and the lathes were run as fast as the tools would allow, and under a heavy feed. Ordinary tempered tools 1 inch by 1½ inch, made of carbon tool steel, were used for this work." (Par. 180, p. 1379.)

"It will be appreciated that this was a big day's work, both for men and machines, when it is understood that it involved removing with a single 16-inch lathe having two saddles an average of more than 800 pounds of steel chips in 10 hours. In place of the 50-cent rate that they had been paid before they were given 35 cents per piece when they turned them at the speed of 10 per day, and when they produced less than 10 they received only 25 cents per piece." (Par. 181, p. 1379.)

HOW HIGH TASKS SHOULD BE SET AT THE START

"As the writer has said several times, the difference between the best speed of a first-class man and the actual speed of the average man is very great. One of the most difficult pieces of work which must be faced by the man who is to set the daily tasks is to decide just how hard it is wise for him to make the task. Shall it be fixed for a first-class man; and if not, then at what point between the first class and the average?" (Par. 382, p. 1441.)

"One fact is clear, it should always be well above the performance of the average man, since men will invariably do better if a bonus is offered them than they have done without this incentive." (Par. 383, p. 1441.)

"The writer has in almost all cases solved this part of the problem by fixing a task which required a first-class man to do his best and then offering a good round premium. When this high standard is set, it takes longer to raise the men up to it. But it is surprising, after all, how rapidly they develop." (Par. 384, p. 1441.)

EACH SHOP EXISTS, FIRST, LAST, AND ALL THE TIME, TO PAY DIVIDENDS TO OWNERS

"On the other hand, this policy of promoting men and finding them new positions has its limits. No worse mistake can be made than that of allowing the establishment to be looked upon as a training school to be used mainly for the education of many of its employees. All employees should bear in mind that each shop exists, first, last, and all the time, for the purpose of paying dividends to its owners. They should have patience and never lose sight of this fact. And no man should expect promotion until after he has trained his successor to take his place." (Par. 312, p. 1419.)

COLLOQUY BETWEEN MR. TAYLOR AND DISSATISFIED CUSTOMER

"Mr. TAYLOR. I think that Mr. Hawkins has also overlooked another important factor, and that is the question of time. If Mr. Hawkins expects large result in 6 months or a year in a very large works, he is looking for the impossible. If he expects to convert union men to a higher rate of production, coupled with high wages, in 6 months or a year, he is expecting next to an impossibility. But if he is patient enough to wait for 2 or 3 years he can go among almost any set of workmen in this country and not find the trouble which he did in Massachusetts.

"Mr. HAWKINS. I have waited 6 years now.

"Mr. TAYLOR. Have you tried the incisive plan of centering on one man instead of going at the whole shooting match at once? I think failure is due to a lack of patient persistence on the part of the employers and then to a lack of centering right onto a single man. No workman can long resist the help and persuasion of five foremen over him. He will either do the work as he is told to or leave."

All of the principal systems of "scientific management" were extensively investigated by a special committee of the House of Representatives last winter. Both the efficiency engineers and the departments concerned were heard at such length as they desired. The Government employees who protested against the introduction of the Taylor system in navy yards and arsenals and workmen who had worked under the system in private employ were also heard at length, and their testimony was uniformly against the system.

Then the committee made its report to the House. Its findings were against the features of the system which were designed to stimulate the workmen to extraordinary exertions. This is shown by the following quotation from Report No. 403 of the committee's report to the House on March 9, 1912:

"In an effort to stimulate the workmen to increased activity various methods are used under different systems, such as discharge, fear of discharge, stop-watch time studies, and bonuses. The fear of discharge exists under any system, and no doubt will continue to exist and to act as a stimulus. The establishment of a premium or bonus presupposes the establishment of a task. The bonus system is based upon the establishment of a task large enough for an ordinary day's work and then giving additional compensation as an inducement to a workman to do more than he would ordinarily do.

The proponents of the Taylor system assert that the workman will be protected against any injustice either in the amount of work required of him or the compensation for that work by a change in the mental attitude brought about by the introduction of the system. A mental attitude which produces a spirit of cooperation between the employer and the employee is much to be desired, but such a spirit is not the result of any particular system of management, but is due almost entirely to the personality of the management and employee and the spirit that prevails in their relations to each other. Your committee is of the opinion that the mere mental attitude of the employer is too variable and unsubstantial a basis upon which to rest the material welfare of the wage worker. Standardizing and systematizing of work can be introduced successfully without any change in mental attitude from that which exists in the ordinary shop, but when it comes to introducing stimulation, a change of mental attitude by which the workman is willing to give a greater amount of energy for the same amount of pay may be very desirable to the employer of labor, but it is not always so desirable to the employee.

"Here is the crux of the difficulty in the introduction of the Taylor or any other system of so-called scientific management. So far as the workmen are concerned, they have not made any serious objections before your committee to standardizing or systematizing of the work, but they have vigorously protested against stimulation on the grounds that it tends to injure their health through overwork, and that while their wages may be temporarily increased, the result is that they are ultimately required to expend the greater amount of energy without receiving any additional pay. In the judgment of your committee, the best and most effective stimulus that can be given to the work in the shop is to secure and hold a fine spirit of cooperation with the management on the part of the workmen. That cannot be secured through timing the operations of the workman with a stop watch when he considers such a procedure an indignity which recognizes him as being in the same class as a beast of burden or a machine, or when he considers such a time study inaccurate, and therefore unjust to him, or when he knows that it is to be used as a basis from which to compute the speed at which he must work and the wages he is to receive, when, in his judgment, the work, speed, and wage rates are being established in order to secure greater profits for the employer at the expense of the workmen."

The employees of the Government, who seem to be unanimous in their opposition to the system, are of the opinion that to carry out a program based upon the principles and methods of the Taylor system above outlined would mean relentless speeding up, destroy harmony among the employees, and would result in various other forms of oppression.

Workmen who have worked under the system in private shops, and who testified before the committee, stated under oath that the system is harsh and oppressive and altogether disagreeable under which to work.

Mr. Taylor does not think that his system is oppressive or relentless, and does not see why workmen should not thrive and be happier under it.

General Crozier, Chief of Ordnance, does not find anything objectionable in the paper, Shop Management, by F. W. Taylor, which has been extensively above quoted. Following is a quotation from a letter of General Crozier to the Secretary of War on the subject, written April 19, 1911, and incorporated in the hearings, page 1162:

"6. Concerning the general protest made by the committee to the effect that the Taylor system is fundamentally based upon overworking and enslaving employees, eliminating the skilled mechanic, and, in general, operating to the disadvantage of employees, I must say that I do not find these features in a perusal of Mr. Taylor's paper. In the absence of experience with his method, as affecting workmen, my knowledge must come mainly from his own statements, and I have interrogated mechanics working under his system and have found them satisfied with it. I find nothing in his description leading to doubt of the statement which he makes in paragraph 21 of his paper: 'This paper is written mainly with the object of advocating high wages and low-labor cost as the foundation of the best management, * * *,' and I give him credit for sincerity in his belief that all employees are better satisfied under his system than under the general system which he wants to replace."

The question to determine is, What is harsh treatment? We submit that certain methods of scientific management are harsh and should not be permitted in Government shops.

The War Department is at present working out the details of the Taylor system at the Watertown Arsenal, Watertown, Mass., so as to make them applicable to the manufacture of ordnance materials, and the testimony at the hearings also shows that the preliminary features of the system are being installed at the Rock Island Arsenal in the machine shop where gun vehicles, limbers, caissons, etc., are manufactured, and that it is the intention of the Ordnance Department to introduce there the other features of the Taylor system as soon as their application has been perfected at the Watertown Arsenal.

Let us turn for a moment to certain recent testimony of the Chief of Ordnance as to the present efficiency of the plant at Rock Island, Ill., and thereby ascertain if the necessity exists for any drastic change of method, or speeding up. On January 13, 1912, General Crozier said before the special committee of the House of Representatives to investigate the Taylor system, etc., as follows (see p. 1118 of hearings):

"We have recently manufactured gun carriages and are doing it still for 3-inch rifles; that is, field guns, at $2,510.60, the exact cost. We purchased those rifle carriages from experienced manufacturers, who had had preceding orders for the same thing, for $3,398.82, an increase of 35.4 percent over our own price. Our carriages were made at the Rock Island Arsenal.

"We have manufactured there, at the same arsenal, caissons, for $1,128.67, and we have purchased the same caissons from private manufacturers who had had previous orders for them, so that they had experience in the manufacture, for $1,744.10, which is 54.6 percent greater than our own price."

On page 1117 of the same hearings General Crozier stated as follows:

"At the Springfield Armory the principal manufacture is small-arms rifles. We make a few other things, but the manufacture is almost entirely of the small-arms rifle. We manufacture that rifle for about $15, and in doing so I take into account what I think should properly be taken into account in the cost; but the Springfield Armory, like the other arsenals, is maintained as an arsenal of storage and issue, as well as a manufacturing place; and, therefore, in computing these costs, I have subtracted from the total expenses of the Springfield Armory those portions which I consider result from its character as an arsenal of issue and storage. Unless somebody goes into the details quite closely, there may be a question as to whether I subtract quite as much as I ought to.

"Therefore, I, last year, for the purpose of satisfying some persons who might have some doubt, made up what I might call an exaggerated cost of the rifles at the Springfield Armory—that is, I took every cent of money that was sent up to the Springfield Armory and charged it to the rifle. Whether it was for the payment of the clerks that were used in the issue of stores, the payment of the storehouse force, whether it was for the payment of the watchmen—they are the guards and custodians of the valuable property we have up there—I charged all the pay of officers and all the pay of everybody concerned to the rifle, and by that means I arrived at a cost of the rifle of $17.64 instead of $15—that is, I found I had to add to the cost as I had reported it about 17 percent. Now, that then became a statement of an exaggerated cost which, whatever the rifle might cost properly, it could not possibly reach. It must have been below $17.65; and if it were possible to obtain the opinion of an expert, I would be glad to ask him if he thought the Springfield rifle could be produced by anybody else anywhere and purchased for $25. My own opinion is that you could not get it as low as $25 from any manufacturer."

The rifles are also made at the Rock Island Arsenal at practically the same figure.

On April 2, 1912, General Crozier stated as follows before a subcommittee of the Appropriation Committee of the House of Representatives relative to the cost of manufacture at the Rock Island Arsenal (see pp. 637–638 of hearings):

"The CHAIRMAN. Do your figures show the comparative cost of manufacture and purchase?

"General CROZIER. Yes.

"The CHAIRMAN. Put them in the record, please.

"General CROZIER. I will mention a few of them for the record. I think I can mention them more summarily, so they can be better comprehended in the record, than if I put in all of these details. I will take the limbers for the 3-inch rifles. The average of three contracts gave a price of $1,518 apiece for those limbers.

"Mr. CANNON. What is a limber?

"General CROZIER. A limber is the forward portion of the wagon which transports the gun, the forward portion of the gun carriage; and the average of five orders for manufacture at the Rock Island Arsenal was $684 apiece. The arsenal cost was less than half the purchase price.

* * * * *

"General CROZIER. Now, for the 3-inch caisson, the average of 5 contracts shows a price of $1,708, and the average of 6 manufacturing orders given to the Rock Island Arsenal is $1,081. The 3-inch gun carriage proper—that is, the vehicle on which the gun rests and from which it is fired—gives as the average price three contracts, $3,268, and the average cost under 5 manufacturing orders at the arsenal was $2,341.

"Mr. CANNON. Does that include overhead charges?

"General CROZIER. Yes, sir."

These figures, representing the cost of manufacture at the Rock Island Arsenal, include all overhead charges, such as pay of officers, interest on investment (which, for the Ordnance Department, is 3 percent), insurance (allowance set aside for fire losses), and depreciation of plant.

It will be observed that the very shop in which ordnance materials are manufactured at less than half of the cost of purchasing from private contractors is the place where it is proposed to install the Taylor system. We submit that the necessity does not exist for the installation of such a system of intensive production, with its accompanying disregard for the welfare of the employee, in a plant where efficiency has already reached an advanced stage.

What has been said of the comparative cost of production at the Rock Island Arsenal and the Springfield Armory is true to a large degree of many other manufacturing plants of the War Department.

The Ordnance Department is to be commended for its ability to manufacture economically, but this much-desired achievement should not be further augmented by the introduction of any system of shop management so apparently unjust to the employees.

If it should appear that other departments of the Government are unable to show as favorable a comparative cost of manufacture as is the case in the War Department, that condition must of necessity be due to other causes, since these plants of the War Department, at the time the costs above referred to were compiled, were operating under the system of management which had been evolved through years of practical experience in the production of ordnance materials, and which is not subject to the criticisms of the Taylor system.

The clerical force necessary for the maintenance of these elaborate systems makes the overhead charges exceedingly great, and it is a question whether the increased productivity of the workmen in the shop, upon whom the heavy burden falls, is sufficient to pay for all this nonproductive labor which has to be added.

On this point the investigating committee of the House says (see Rept. No. 403):

"The Taylor system undertakes to systematize the work first by the establishment of a planning department; second, by detail study of the shop and the elements of a particular piece of work; third, by a routing system; and out of these grow a multitude of other details, such as job cards, routing cards, time study, and many others. So much of this kind of detail work is needed under this system that it appears to your committee that constant care would have to be exercised in order to prevent the overhead charges thus created from using up all of the benefits which might be derived from the proper systematization of the work."

The machine shop of the Midvale Steel Co., at Philadelphia, Pa., where Mr. Taylor perfected his system, has since his advent there, abandoned most of it as an unprofitable method of management. Some of the features of the system which are obnoxious to workmen are still in vogue there, however. One of the strongest competitors of this concern for Government work is the Washington Navy Yard, where the system is not used.

That the navy yard is a strong competitor is shown in the testimony of Capt. E. H. C. Leutze, commandant of the Washington Navy Yard at Washington, D. C., before the Naval Affairs Committee of the House, February 28, 1906, in which he shows that the cost of manufacture at that yard is less in most cases than by contract.

The purpose of this bill (S. 6172) is to prevent the use of the stop watch and the premium and bonus system of compensation, which together form the basic elements that are responsible for the excesses committed; and their use is not necessary to any proper system of efficiency, which is demonstrated by the absence of these elements in other efficient manufacturing plants.

The employees of the Government agree with Mr. Taylor in regarding these two features of the Taylor system as the foundation of the rest. He says, in Shop Management, regarding his bonus system:

"* * * It is to compel the completion of the daily task, then, that two of the other principles are required, namely, 'high pay for success' and 'loss in case of failure.' The advantage of Mr. Gantt's system of 'task work with a bonus' and the writer's 'differential-rate piecework' over the other systems lies in the fact that with each of these the men automatically and daily receive either an extra reward in case of complete success, or a distinct loss in case they fall off even a little." (Par. 161, p. 1372.)

Regarding the importance of the stop-watch "time study," the author says:

"* * * And first among these comes the study of 'unit time.'

"324. This, as already explained, is the most important element of the system advocated by the writer. Without it the definite, clear-cut directions given to the foreman and the assigning of a full, yet just, daily task, with its premium for success, would be impossible; and the arch without the keystone would fall to the ground."

As long as the departments insist upon holding these features in the background, with the understanding that they are to be used at some future time, it will be impossible to secure the cooperation of the employees as to other changes which might be advantageous, due to the suspicion which now exists.

The passage of this bill will allay fear and suspicion, and for that reason will be for the good of the service.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the committee accepts the position of the War Department in this matter. They favor the deletion of this language as it was carried in the bill last year. I hold in my hand a letter from the Secretary of War, dated April 17, 1947, to the chairman of the committee, in which Mr. Patterson states:

The War Department favors the deletion of entire section 2.

This is the language which the gentleman seeks to include or reinstate in the bill by his amendment. It was section 2 of the bill last year.

The committee is further impelled to this position by testimony before it with reference to the savings that could be accomplished as well as by the letter from Secretary Patterson. This testimony was presented by Commander Harold J. Mock, representing a committee of ex-Army and Navy industrial engineers. The chairman asked Mr. Mock when he was before us:

To what extent is private industry using this time study and the methods you are advocating?

Mr. Mock said:

Here is a survey by Prof. Ralph Barnes, of the University of Iowa; 97 percent of the large cross section of industry he canvassed use such studies.

In further discussion it was suggested by witnesses that the amount of savings might be 10 percent. Mr. Thurston, former TWA engineer who appeared with Mr. Mock, said:

I would say that on $5,000,000,000, for example, they would save half a billion dollars, in pay roll, material, and equipment.

There were other witnesses, all of whom urged that the War Department be freed from the prohibition against time studies. Their testimony appears at pages 1556 to 1573, inclusive, of the printed hearings on the bill.

In view of that record, the committee asks the rejection of the amendment.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this amendment is as absurd as the situation that prevails in some areas of the country today where a bricklayer who could lay 1,100 bricks in a normal day's work and could lay 1,500 bricks if he humped himself a bit is now laying 200 bricks. The fact that he is laying 200 bricks is one of the reasons why the cost of construction has gone up and why houses for veterans are not being built.

The War Department is spending public money. What possible justification can there be for inserting an amendment that prevents increasing the efficiency of Government operation?

Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. ENGEL of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendations that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MICHENER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3678) making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

By unanimous consent, the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FORAND asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include a copy of the Borah report in the Sixty-second Congress and also include a table.

PERMISSION TO EXTEND REMARKS AT THIS POINT

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, there is no Member of the House more economy minded than I am. The fact is the average Member of this body is making a sincere effort to cut down public expenditures.

It is difficult to differentiate between true and false economy. While we simply must eliminate a great many agencies to which we have become accustomed, we certainly cannot impair our armed forces.

Even a wayfaring man knows the reason we are respected today as a Nation is because of our strength.

Providence has been kind to us during the two preceding world Wars. We were given time to get ready. We cannot safely assume that we will be given sufficient time again.

In this atomic age with the terrific speed with which we move we simply must keep abreast, and in fact ahead, of other countries in fighting equipment.

Our Air Forces are properly referred to as our first line of defense. Were we to withhold necessary funds for the maintenance of a strong air force we would be breaking faith with all of those who fought in past wars.

The gentleman from Texas, my colleague, Congressman MAHON, is to be complimented for his zeal in presenting the fight for necessary funds for the air force.

I am happy to have contributed my influence toward providing these much needed funds. Our Republican friends have shown the proper spirit when they acknowledge their mistake in seeking to withhold necessary funds from the Air Force.

COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICE AND CIVIL SERVICE—INVESTIGATION OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 176 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized and directed to conduct thorough studies and investigations relating to matters coming within the jurisdiction of such committee under rule XI (1) (e) of the Rules of the House of Representatives, and for such purposes the said committee or any subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States, whether the House is in session, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, and to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memoranda, papers, and documents, as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued over the signature of the chairman of the committee or any member of the committee designated by him, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses.

That the said committee shall report to the House of Representatives during the present Congress the results of their studies and investigations with such recommendations for legislation or otherwise as the committee deems desirable.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 176, which was reported unanimously by the Committee on Rules, authorized the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, which is headed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES], to conduct a thorough study and investigation of all matters coming within its jurisdiction relative to the functioning and operation of two very important divisions of the Federal Government. First, the Civil Service Commission, which comes under the jurisdiction of the committee, and second, the Post Office Department.

The committee would have authority to go into any other matter coming under its jurisdiction but it is the intention and purpose of this resolution, and of the committee, to make investigation and study of these two important governmental agencies.

During the war it was necessary for the Civil Service Commission and the Congress to set aside many of the regulations, rules, and restrictions surrounding the selection and appointment of civilian employees of the Federal Government. Now that the war is ended it is believed that by proper study and investigation of the Civil Service Commission and its activities and functions that this committee of the House, headed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES], can bring about greater efficiency and economy in connection with the employment of Government civilian personnel.

The other investigation which will be conducted by the committee if this resolution is adopted, as I hope and am sure it will be, is of the Post Office Department. The Post Office Department is the Government's greatest single business operation. The Post Office Department is a great service agency of the Government. It has been operating at a heavy loss, with a deficit of somewhere near $300,000,000 for the last year's operation. There has been considerable discussion as to increasing postal rates in order to meet this deficit. In fact, the administration submitted to the Congress suggested legislation for an increase of postal rates to meet the deficit which has been created in the Post Office Department. It seems to me, and I believe it should appeal to the reason and the logic of any individual, that before the Congress of the United States enacts legislation to increase postal rates, and to thus place a further burden upon the people, at the very hour and moment that the President of the United States is calling for a reduction in prices of most goods and commodities, that a thorough investigation should be conducted to ascertain the necessity for such increases. Certainly, first of all, the Congress should investigate and make a thorough survey and a careful study of this gigantic, far-flung agency of the Government, the Post Office Department, in an attempt to determine whether or not there is any waste and extravagance in that agency of Government; to determine whether greater efficiency cannot be obtained, and that, perhaps, by the elimination of waste and extravagance, by gaining greater efficiency, by modernization, if you please, of the operations of the Post Office Department, we may be able to eliminate most or all of the deficit which exists there, and thus make unnecessary any higher burden of postal rates upon the people. If the deficit cannot be entirely eliminated, certainly it would be wise for us to reduce it as much as possible, so that we need not increase postal rates any more than may be absolutely necessary.

Personally, I am confident that this study and this investigation will reveal great opportunities for savings in the operation of the United States Postal Service.

I have high personal regard for the gentleman who serves as the Postmaster General of the United States, but I am not at all certain that he has devoted his entire time to an earnest endeavor to bring about efficiency in the postal service or to eliminate waste and extravagance in that agency of the Government. I know the Post Office Department is presumed to be conducted under the merit system, and I think perhaps that is true in some branches and divisions and in some types of work; but certainly if there is any one division or any one branch of the Federal Government in which politics sometimes enters it is in the Post Office Department as now constituted.

I do not want to discuss the Department from a political angle, however, except to say that whenever any agency of the Federal Government shows an operating deficit of approximately $300,000,000, in my opinion it is time for the Congress of the United States, representing the people, to at least take a little "look-see" at the operation of that Department.

I am sure that under the direction of the able gentleman from Kansas any investigation which will be made of the Post Office Department or of the Civil Service Commission will not be a witch hunt, it will not be political—but I do want to remind the Members of the House that it has been many, many, many years since any real study or any real investigation of either department has been undertaken. Certainly, in this modern day and age, new methods can be found—in fact, new methods are available—by which a better postal service can be given to the people at a lower cost than they have enjoyed in the past. So I am hoping that this House will adopt this resolution and that there will be no attempt to enact legislation to increase postal rates until we first know whether or not it is necessary to increase them and, if so, by how much. That to me is just common sense. I do not believe anyone in this body can disagree with that logic.

I believe as a result of these investigations that we as Members of Congress will be meeting our obligation to our constituents because, as I have said before on this floor and elsewhere, the Congress of the United States, as the representatives of the people, have two great responsibilities. The first is to legislate, and the second is to investigate. We owe a responsibility to the people not only to enact laws but to see to it that the laws that we have enacted are administered properly, and that the other branches of the Government are conducting public affairs as we, the people, want them conducted.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. Is there any objection to this? It seems to me that when the question is raised the first agency to come in and welcome the investigation would be the Department itself.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I can say to the gentleman that I have had no message from the Postmaster General giving his approval to this resolution. However, I feel, as the gentleman from Michigan expresses himself, that no fair-minded person, including the Postmaster General, can object to this sort of an investigation.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BENDER. I have been getting a lot of letters recently from back home regarding increased postal rates, on postcards, and so forth. Does this have anything to do with that?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I hope it will have a great deal to do with it. I hope that as a result of this investigation and the elimination of waste and extravagance and the greater efficiency which this investigation will bring about, that it will not be necessary to increase the postal rates in any great amount, if at all.

Mr. BENDER. It is a serious mistake for us to increase the rates unless we cut expenses first and find out what the score is in the Post Office Department. The people back home are not interested in increased costs, as far as the Government is concerned. I know how they feel about the possibility of increased postal rates. I hope that this resolution will carry and that it will actually effect the economies necessary so that these rates will not be increased.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MONRONEY. I am very much interested, as is the gentleman from Ohio, in effecting any possible economies in the Post Office Department. I would like to inquire if this investigation will be broad enough so that this committee can also look into the great losses that are being taken, at the direction of Congress. I have in mind the charge made by the gentleman's colleague from Illinois [Mr. MASON] last year, that we were subsidizing the mail order catalog houses to the extent of about a hundred million dollars a year, I believe.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Oh, yes, I have heard that charge made a great many times.

Mr. MONRONEY. I wonder if they will look into that?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Yes, of course; but in the gentleman's mind it is probably wrong for the Federal Government to furnish any service of any kind that would be of any benefit to any legitimate business or enterprise in the United States. We should do nothing of course, as the gentleman points out, that would help create jobs or that would help industry and commerce in this country.

Mr. MONRONEY. Of course, we have several kinds of industry and commerce. Some of it is little business which definitely is not helped.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. In the particular bill that has been suggested by the administration, little business would suffer more than anyone else as a result of an increase in the postal rates. It would be little business which would be injured the most by the enactment of the proposed rate-raising legislation.

Mr. MONRONEY. Will the gentleman answer my question; that is, if the committee will look into all of these rates?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I cannot guarantee the gentleman what this committee will do, but, knowing the gentleman from Kansas, and the membership of his committee as I do, and knowing that it has able representatives of both parties within that membership, I am certain the committee and its chairman will investigate fully every phase of the problem.

Mr. MONRONEY. The resolution, therefore, is broad enough to permit them to investigate the question I have raised.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Certainly, the resolution is broad enough to permit the committee to make a complete and thorough investigation of all phases, and I believe the gentleman from Kansas will agree with me.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PICKETT. Does the gentleman from Ohio have knowledge at this time whether the passage of this resolution will result in a request of the Committee on House Administration for funds with which to carry on the investigation, and if so, how much will be requested?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I presume that some funds will be necessary. The gentleman from Kansas, who is chairman of the committee which will be in control of the investigation, can answer that question far better than I, and I suggest that the gentleman wait until he takes the floor.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Is this resolution broad enough to permit the investigation of the Department now curtailing mail service and giving as an excuse that it is necessary because of decreased appropriations for the Department?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I believe that this committee will have the power under this resolution—in fact, it already has the general power, outside of subpena and other specific requirements—to look into the conduct of the officials in charge of the Post Office Department, and of the Civil Service Commission, however it may affect mail delivery.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. I would like to say to the gentleman that this year particularly I have been confronted with the abandonment of Star Route service in my district, the curtailing of post office service there, such as has never happened before, and the response I get from the Department is that it was because of the decreased appropriations and therefore was made necessary. Of course, the gentleman and I can see through the Postmaster General's strategy in that respect.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Perhaps the gentleman will be greatly interested in the adoption of this resolution to find out, through this proper congressional committee, whether or not this curtailment has been necessary, and if not, why it has taken place.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. I will say to the gentleman I am very much in favor of the resolution.

Mr. POTTS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. POTTS. Up in New York City there are 300 veterans on substitute status in the Post Office Department who, for a long time, have been trying to get regular status, and they have been given pretty much the run-around on the theory that funds have been taken from here and put there, and I am just wondering whether under this resolution the committee will be in a position to investigate that condition.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am certain that the committee will be in position to investigate any and all activities of the Post Office Department under this resolution.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I know one post office where veterans have served for a number of months, or a year, on a temporary basis, and they were not notified when the examination for permanent positions was to be held.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Whether that would be the fault of the Post Office Department or of the Civil Service Commission, I cannot say, but under either circumstance under this resolution the committee would have the power and the authority to look into the matter and perhaps either straighten it out or bring in legislation that would straighten it out in the future.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. That would probably rectify it anyway.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

WE WANT NO WITCH HUNT

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Ohio is right when he says that this will not be a witch hunt. To the gentleman who propounded the inquiry as to whether this resolution is broad enough to investigate certain matters, may I say, remembering who propounded the inquiry, that this resolution is indeed broad enough. Under this resolution that committee can do anything and everything they desire. They can investigate anybody and everybody at all times, in the District of Columbia or anywhere and everywhere in the United States. But though they are given such great jurisdiction and power, I hope this committee will not interfere with the investigation or invade the jurisdiction of the committee known as the Committee on Un-American Activities. I hope they will not interfere with them.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

I AM FOR ECONOMY AND EFFICIENCY

Mr. SABATH. I will as soon as I conclude what I have in mind, although the gentleman never shows me the courtesy.

I hope the committee will make a thorough investigation. I am for economy and I am for efficiency. Personally, I believe the Post Office Department and its employees have served the country well and efficiently. For years and years I have heard no complaint as to the efficiency of that Department unless it would be a frivolous complaint for political purposes, as in the present occasion, when someone somewhere might say that one of his constituents did not get his letter on time or did not receive the parcel that was mailed to him.

Mr. MACKINNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I will yield later. I cannot yield at this point.

Surely, if waste exists, then I hope they investigate and expose it. But I hope they do not come to a fore-ordained conclusion that the deficiency which exists in the Department because of business subsidies on second-class and fourth-class matter, and on third-class matter too, both in direct payment to railroads, steamship companies, and air lines and in low rates on business mail, should be made up by taking out of the salaries and wages of already too low-paid Post Office Department employees. I am of the opinion that money can be saved; and we can reduce the operating deficit in the Department by compelling the beneficiaries of second- and fourth-class service to pay fair compensation. I believe on those two divisions alone we may be able to save from $150,000,000 to $175,000,000 annually and that it will not be necessary for the gentleman to try to reduce the wages of the Post Office employees.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Would the gentleman want to impose a postal rate on country newspapers within the county of publication? Is that what the gentleman refers to when he refers to second-class mail?

SMALL PAPERS CLOSER TO THE PEOPLE

Mr. SABATH. No, I will be perfectly candid. I think the country newspapers, these small papers, are nearer to the people than some of the big newspapers and especially those magazines consisting of 200 and 300 pages where fully 70 percent of the publication consists of high-priced paid advertising and very little reading matter. Frequently I spend a great deal of time trying to find an article in some of these magazines to enlighten me, but the only thing I can find is advertising, more advertising, and additional advertising. So you do not have to be alarmed. I am always with the people of the country sections.

These little papers, I think, are closer to the public than some of the big newspapers who seem to be speaking for the big interests and advocating their cause in general because of the advertising that comes to those papers from big concerns who spend hundreds of thousands of dollars a year. Naturally, the big newspapers are big business too, and all that advertising does not make them unfriendly to their fellow businessmen. That, I hope, explains my position.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. I take it then the gentleman would be in favor of an increased postal rate for the large newspapers that are making more money now than ever before?

BIG PUBLISHERS ARE PROSPEROUS

Mr. SABATH. I would not single out the big newspapers especially. I am after the magazines, too. I admit that the big newspapers and magazines are making more money, and have made more money, in the last 15 years under Democratic administrations than ever before. We can all remember the time when they had a lean and hungry look, with just a few pages; but now they cannot find enough paper to hold all the profitable advertising they can sell.

But most of all I am after those great big catalogs of the mail-order houses. Although the very largest of them are located in my city, I still think they ought to pay the Government their fair share of what it costs to deliver their catalogs to every nook and corner of these United States, to the cost and detriment of the small storekeepers and the taxpayers.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. HOFFMAN. You were talking about this resolution being so broad.

Mr. SABATH. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I notice it is very, very narrow. It says here that they shall hold these hearings at such times and places within the United States.

Mr. SABATH. I said within the United States.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes; I know; but the other resolutions—for instance, the law on the National Labor Relations Board—say they can go to any Territory. Don't you see? That is much broader than this is.

Mr. SABATH. That is not included in this resolution. Somehow or other they do not seem to plan to go that far.

Mr. HOFFMAN. This is much narrower than the resolution for the National Labor Relations Board.

Mr. SABATH. I am mighty glad to hear the gentleman say it is a very narrow and circumvented resolution, but, of course, I cannot agree with him.

Mr. HOFFMAN. But the question I wanted to ask is if the bill for statehood for Hawaii goes through and Hawaii becomes a State, can they go out there and hold these hearings?

Mr. SABATH. If Hawaii becomes a State, perhaps they would have jurisdiction. There is no doubt about that. But it has not passed the House yet, and I do not know whether it will.

SHOULD NOT CUT DOWN ON RURAL FREE DELIVERY

Mr. Speaker, of course, this is an investigation. I hope the gentleman from Kansas and his committee will not go out and try to save some money on the rural deliveries though. We spend tremendous sums of money for rural free delivery. I hope they will not try to eliminate any service to farm dwellers or cut down the reasonable and fair compensation given to rural carriers.

I am hopeful they will not try to disrupt the efficient service of the Government.

NO GREATER LOYALTY THAN IN POSTAL SERVICE

As to the loyalty, I do not know how many hundred thousand men are employed in that Department, but there is no department anywhere that has shown greater loyalty than those men who have served for years in the Post Office Department. To even insinuate that they are not patriotic and that they do not have the best interests of the country at heart or that they do not serve the Nation well, would be manifestly unfair and unjustifiable. I think we should be proud of the service the Post Office Department has rendered to our country.

Mr. MACKINNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. MACKINNON. Is there any serious doubt in your mind that there has been a deterioration in the quality of the postal service in this country in recent months?

NO DETERIORATION OF MAIL SERVICE

Mr. SABATH. Personally, I do not think there has been any deterioration at all. I think we have as splendid service now as we ever had. Naturally, during the war we suffered. Thousands upon thousands of these men volunteered their services to the country. They have served the country in various important positions as soldiers and sailors, and in operating the wartime Army and Navy postal services, and in countless other ways. Now those men are coming back after 3 or 4 years, and under the law that we passed, they are entitled to be reinstated in their positions. It may require a few weeks for them to acquire again that high efficiency which had been theirs before they resigned their positions to join the Army or the Navy. But I think it is manifestly unfair to try to insinuate or charge that there is inefficiency in that Department.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. COX. My colleague, the gentleman from Illinois, has made a very excellent statement. In view of the fact that there is no opposition to this bill and in view of the expectation that a bill will follow on which there is some division of opinion, does not the gentleman think that we might save a little time and conclude this debate, forego the temptation to make a speech, and vote on the resolution? That observation did not have the purpose of ending the gentleman's statement.

Mr. SABATH. That is very kind. Unless it is necessary to enlighten some of the Republicans, I usually do not take time. Day before yesterday we passed three different resolutions within 15 minutes and I did not take any time at all because I felt it was not necessary. But in view of the statements of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN], and the insinuations made against the Department, I felt it was my duty to explain, and I could not refuse to give these gentlemen the information they sought, because I think they are entitled to it. I do not know whether they will get it when this investigation takes place.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. COX. The purpose of my statement was not to conclude the gentleman's speech. I thought the gentleman had finished.

Mr. SABATH. Oh, I know the gentleman is always trying to be helpful. I am grateful to him.

Mr. MACKINNON. Will the gentleman yield, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SABATH. No, I cannot yield, because you see I have been admonished that I have been taking up too much time now. The gentleman is interested in other legislation which I am very much interested in myself and have been for many weeks. I am glad he is interested in the same legislation which is in the interest of the country. So I am going to conclude, Mr. Speaker, but before I conclude I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LYLE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has consumed 16 minutes.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LYLE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MACKINNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a consent request?

Mr. LYLE. I yield.

Mr. MACKINNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include two or three letters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. MACKINNON. Mr. Speaker, to enlighten the gentleman from Illinois, I insert a letter and a telegram from a small nursery and a small newspaper in my district which testify to the serious deterioration in the postal service and the adverse effect this is having on the small businessman:

ALLENORE NURSERY,
Excelsior, Minn., May 5, 1947.

POSTMASTER,
Minneapolis, Minn.

DEAR SIR: Enclosed herewith is a tag from a package of strawberry plants mailed at Minneapolis, Minn., on Sunday, April 27, to Henry Reinking, Oelwein, Iowa. According to his letter attached hereto, these plants were received by him on May 5. It doesn't take much figuring to see that this is ridiculous service on perishable matter.

We have already had a dozen similar complaints in the last 10 days and we usually have only one or two in an entire season. On this particular order referred to above, our loss is $6, and our loss so far on account of this kind of service is $50. We ship between 500 and 1,000 orders a season by parcel post and have been shipping for 15 years, and in our entire experience we have never seen anything as bad as present condition of service. If it were to continue, it would ruin our business.

I have also been in the postal service for nearly 30 years, and it seems plain to me that the present policy of the Department is very much a losing proposition for all concerned.

We wish you wou'd transmit this complaint to the proper officials in the Department.

Yours very truly,

ALLENORE NURSERY,
AL JOHNSON.

Copies to Senator BALL, Senator THYE, Congressman MACKINNON, and Superintendent of Railway Mail, tenth division.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., May 24, 1947.

GEORGE MACKINNON,
Congressman, Third Minnesota District.

DEAR GEORGE: We have started new publication, North Minneapolis Post, distributed through the post office free. We delivered 4,000 papers at the Minneapolis post office Wednesday night. They had not even been taken off truck Thursday afternoon, on which they were placed late Wednesday. Complaints brought answer, Will take care of it next week. That answer will not bring back advertisements we have lost. Hate to complain, but why should newspapers placed in Robbinsdale post office Thursday night not reach Golden Valley until the next Wednesday morning? Service from the Minneapolis post office the poorest in history.

H. O. SONNESYN,
Editor, Robbinsdale Post.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, first let me say that I shall not vote against this resolution. This resolution did not come out of my committee, as a matter of fact, and the first time I ever heard of it was when I saw it posted on the whip's notice for call. Since the Rules Committee has taken up so much of the time discussing this matter, I am quite certain now that it probably originated in the Rules Committee and not in my committee. I wish to say, however, that in my judgment this resolution comes before you with a cloud, for I have read, and read, and read the last few weeks in the newspapers that the Republican high command wanted this resolution so that during the ensuing months they have have some opportunity to find something to use in the next political campaign. I say to you that I do not believe the chairman of my committee wants that, nor do the members of my splendid committee. If that is what the Republican high command wants they are going to be considerably disappointed because I feel that the chairman of my committee is such a man and such a Congressman that any investigation that will be made under this resolution will be in the interest of the people. I would like to say here how much I admire the fairness and ability of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES], the chairman of my committee. It has been a pleasure to serve on the committee with him.

The gentleman from Ohio spoke about postal rates. The entire membership knows that he is opposed to an increase of postal rates. He has always been opposed to it, but the bill that is now pending before the Rules Committee to increase postal rates was introduced by a Republican. As I recall it, every Republican member on the committee voted for it, with perhaps one exception. I believe only two Democrats voted for it. I certainly did not vote for it.

I am opposed to the postal rate increase bill that was voted out. I tried to influence the Republican Members, but I did not have any more success than did apparently the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYLE. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. The complaints I have received with reference to the postal service is that the Department has approved extensions of rural routes all over the country and now does not have the funds to put them in operation.

Mr. LYLE. That is exactly the point.

Mr. RANKIN. My contention is that if we are going to take the mail to one man we ought to take it to all. I would much rather see these rural routes extended to every farmhouse, even if we had to raise some of the rates to which the gentleman referred.

Mr. LYLE. That is a fair proposition. The reason I opposed this particular bill was that it was not a well-rounded-out postal increase bill. As a matter of fact the money this committee will spend investigating would probably extend some of those routes and bring service to people in rural areas.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman means the investigation made in order by this resolution?

Mr. LYLE. That is right. They could use this money to carry the mails to people who do not now get it.

It ought to be eminently clear to the Members that this postal rate increase bill we are discussing was not an administration bill, was not sponsored by the administration; and as far as I know the administration is not for it.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYLE. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Every official of the Post Office Department who came before our committee said, "These are the suggestions of the Post Office Department"; and they asked for a much greater increase in postal rates than the committee reported out, if the gentleman will recall.

Mr. LYLE. I do; but I do not recall it that way, I may say to the gentleman from Missouri; and I am sure we have an honest difference of opinion. As I recall, Mr. LANGER wrote them a letter and asked them about postal increases and they said: "If you want to wipe out this deficit here is the way we recommend that you do it."

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYLE. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. REES. I want to keep the record straight, if we can.

Mr. LYLE. Yes; we would like to keep it straight.

Mr. REES. The gentleman who now has the floor does not contend that he at all times opposed increases in the postal rates?

Mr. LYLE. Oh, no. I do not now oppose increases in the postal rates.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to this floor a well-balanced postal increase bill that would make the postal system pay its way. The Chairman knows that we could not get such a bill out of the committee.

Mr. REES. That is correct.

Mr. LYLE. What we got was simply what people were not opposed to.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYLE. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Is it not a little bit odd that the House at this time is bringing out a bill to investigate the Post Office Department and at the same time in the other body they are going to bring in a bill asking for $35,000 to investigate postmaster appointments?

The gentleman from Ohio says that this is not politics. If this is not politics I would like to know what it is.

Mr. LYLE. I have not been here as long as a lot of you, I am not as old as a lot of you, and not so wise, but it seems to me when you start to try to change administrations you have a lot of these resolutions in the interest of the people. Of course, they seldom ever affect the people very favorably. I do not think there ought to be any disguise about this thing. If they can find anything wrong in the Civil Service Commission or the Post Office Department or anywhere else, I believe every good Democrat and every good Republican ought to tell the people about it, change it if they can, because though I am a Democrat I love my country just about as much as the Republicans.

Mr. RANKIN. May I say to the gentleman that as I understand it there are certain classes of mail that now operate at a deficit of more than a hundred million dollars a year.

Mr. LYLE. Yes; congressional mail and mail of the Government.

Mr. RANKIN. I am not talking about Government mail. The gentleman knows there are certain classes of mail that are being carried at a loss to the Government of around a hundred million dollars.

Mr. LYLE. Newspapers and magazines?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. LYLE. Oh, yes.

Mr. RANKIN. I would much rather see them pay their way and these rural delivery routes established and extended to every farmhouse.

If I had my way we would have a rural route to every farmhouse and a rural power line to every farm home in America.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYLE. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. The gentleman referred a moment ago to the Republican leadership, and possibly to the Republican high command. I do not know whether I fit that qualification or not.

Mr. LYLE. The gentleman is about as high as you can go.

Mr. HALLECK. I would like to say to the gentleman I completely approve of the last statement he made before he yielded to the gentleman from Mississippi, in which he referred to the responsibility upon each one of us, Republicans and Democrats, to do what we can to improve the efficiency of the Post Office Department.

Mr. LYLE. That is correct.

Mr. HALLECK. As far as I am concerned, I am not approaching this in any partisan manner. I am not a member of the committee, but I do know it is estimated there will be a deficit in the Post Office Department of something like $300,000,000. When the President sent up his message on the state of the Union he referred to that prospective deficit and, if I recall correctly, the President said he would ask the Department to make recommendations for a program to meet that deficit. There are various proposals before us looking to raising the rates to meet that deficit. But many people in all sincerity and honesty urge that there could be greater efficiency in the Post Office Department, that certain things could be improved on or changed which would eliminate part of this deficit. As far as I am concerned, I would like to see this committee, if authorized under this resolution to do so, go into the investigation with that primary objective in mind. Certainly, I am sure there would be no disagreement between the gentleman from Texas and me on that score.

Mr. LYLE. I hope not, and I appreciate the gentleman's statement. But I want to answer the gentleman in this way: All of the members of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service are honorable, able men—all of them. They are extremely able men, but I sincerely doubt that if we investigate all summer and all next year that we could make many intelligent suggestions to men who have spent lifetimes—25, 35, and 45 years—in the Post Office Department, and who are not political appointees. I do not know whether they are Democrats or Republicans. The Post Office Department, in my judgment, is the best operated Department of any in the Government.

Mr. HALLECK. I appreciate what the gentleman has said. However, of course, under the Reorganization Act, it is contemplated that each committee maintain continuing surveillance of the operation of the department under its jurisdiction.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. VURSELL].

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, in sponsoring this resolution for an investigation, had in mind nothing political, but they believed that with an organization that had grown to the size of the Post Office Department, as well as the Civil Service Commission and other departments of government, it was time for the Congress to look into the matter from top to bottom in order to determine if a part of this deficit could not be made up by bringing about greater efficiency in this vast public service. I do not know of any big successful business organization in the United States that does not have some top people studying and conducting research constantly in order to bring about greater economy and efficiency in the conduct of that business. I realize that the postal service is headed by able men, mostly career men, and I think generally they are doing a splendid job. But it does seem to me that in an organization as vast as this there ought to be some chairman of the board, some board of directors, and this Congress, apparently, is the only board of directors that would have the power to look into a matter of this kind in an effort to plan and bring about greater economy and efficiency.

We do not plan a political witch hunt investigation, and I would not be a party to it, if it were. The members of my committee have not approached it in this manner.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TWYMAN].

Mr. TWYMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that there has been any inference at all that there might be a political motive in connection with this resolution. When we first started to consider the proposal of meeting the deficit, which is estimated at $310,000,000 for this fiscal year and over $400,000,000 for next year, we invited Mr. Hannegan, the Postmaster General, to attend and listen to the hearings. He sent word back each time that he was ill or busily engaged otherwise. We wanted his counsel and advice as to how we could reduce the estimated deficits. When I insisted that the Postmaster General should be present, someone inferred that there might be some political motive in trying to get him to come to the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee.

The term "investigation" is being used in connection with this resolution. It really should be considered as an examination and should be welcomed by the Civil Service Commission and the Post Office Department.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the rest of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKETT].

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to ask the chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES], this question: I take it the gentleman whose name is on this resolution has given some thought as to how he expects to proceed when the resolution is adopted giving him power to make the investigation. As a member of the Committee on House Administration, in whose hands it will devolve to pass upon the amount of money to be given to the gentleman's committee if he comes forward and asks funds for that purpose, may I ask him if he has made any analysis of whether he expects to make a request for funds to further the investigation; and if so, how much money he thinks he is going to want?

Mr. REES. May I say to the gentleman it is quite difficult to determine how much money may be required to conduct the investigation we have in mind, but presently we have in mind asking the committee for $25,000. The gentleman may be assured as a member of that committee that at all times we shall be glad to keep the committee advised with respect to the manner in which the funds are expended. After all, we understand it will be within the control of your great committee to determine the amount of money that may be required to carry on this investigation. I say to the gentleman—and I shall say it again if I have any time when the others have spoken—I happen to be chairman of the committee, but I am glad to yield to the other gentlemen who are interested in this problem—that this study is not to be political and it is not to be a witch hunt, as far as the chairman of this committee is concerned. I appreciate the interest of the gentleman in this problem, and I trust we may have his full and complete support in the conduct of this investigation.

Mr. PICKETT. I thank the gentleman, both for his answer to the question and the speech he made in answering it. May I say to the gentleman from Kansas that he is requesting a modest amount, in view of some of the other requests that have come before our committee for investigation at this session. May I say further that if you did decide to enter upon a witch hunt as a result of this resolution—and I deny that there is any implication of that in my remarks—you could not get very far on $25,000.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS].

MAKE THE POSTAL SERVICE EFFICIENT

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, for more than 14 years, efforts to make the postoffice operations efficient and economical have been relegated to merely secondary consideration.

Now, the Department comes in asking for heavy appropriations while seeking to continue operations under the administrations of a Postmaster General whose position as chairman of the Democratic National Committee demands his first, and almost entire, time, while deputies and subordinate officers are left to operate our national postal service as best they may.

The time has come when there should be a thoroughgoing survey of the postal service. Its methods of accounting and the practice of creating jobs for political henchmen must be cleaned up and the whole operation put on the basis of efficiency first.

The postal service deserves and demands the full attention of the Cabinet officer who heads it; therefore, Mr. Hannegan should either resign his job as chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and devote his full time and attention to the demands of the postal service, or he should resign his place as Postmaster General in the Cabinet of the President, and make way for some individual who at least believes the American people are entitled to the most efficient postal service they can get.

There is no question among those who know but that the postal service has suffered lamentably through the failure of the Postmaster General to regard it as vastly important to the national economy, and the welfare of the country, instead of looking at it purely as a political pie counter to be used for the payment of political debts.

The jobs of Postmaster General and chairman of the Democratic National Committee should be divorced, and divorced now.

We must have a thoroughgoing survey of the Post Office Department and its operations, carefully and impartially carried out.

The American people will approve of such a survey because the postal service is being so badly administered by politicians. It is one of the biggest businesses in America; it is one of the most important businesses in America; it is one of the basic services of America, and deserves to be treated as such and conducted in a manner appropriate to those concepts.

The people of America who use the postal service must realize that they must pay for any inefficiency.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a considerable amount of confusion with respect to this resolution. Part of the time we are discussing the postal bill and the other part we are discussing the resolution under consideration.

May I say again for the record it is not the intent of the chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service to make a political issue of this matter. It is too important for that. We intend to be fair to all parties concerned. This is not to be a witch hunt. I hope and trust it will be a thorough, fair, and constructive investigation and examination and survey of departments of Government as far as the committee may be able to go with its authority, its time, and the funds that may be allowed.

The jurisdiction of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee extends to matters affecting all of the Government departments on the question of personnel, reduction in force, procedures, loyalty of employees, salaries, and classification, together with the extension of the activities of the postal service. Those are among the things we have in mind. Problems requiring special authorization or authority to investigate, together with the power of subpena and the required funds, are the things that come under the terms of this resolution.

Members of this committee and Members of Congress many times have had questions raised as to whether the civilian employment under civil service is being conducted as provided by law and as provided by the intent of Congress. I refer, among other things, to the question of veterans' preference.

There are two major items that require complete and extensive investigation in order to collect sufficient data upon which concrete recommendations for corrective action may be made.

The first is a detailed investigation into the postal service to determine where economies may be made.

As chairman of the committee, I am convinced economies can be made in the postal service. I also believe it can be made more efficient. I want to agree with a gentleman from Texas, a very able member of our committee, that so far as employees in the postal service are concerned there is no criticism intended whatsoever. Generally speaking, they are industrious, patriotic, and loyal and rank high among the citizens of this country.

The Post Office Department is faced with a deficit of approximately $300,000,000 even with the present emergency rates being retained. The President in his budget message said he requested the Post Office Department to recommend rates that would take care of the entire deficit of $300,000,000.

It is true the Postmaster General was invited to come before our committee. He failed to do so. Later on, I am informed he became ill and was confined to a hospital. In any event the Post Office Department through the First Assistant Postmaster General, and other officials, submitted recommendations to increase postal rates that amounted to $176,000,000 according to their figures. I introduced a bill that included their recommendations.

The First Assistant Postmaster General appeared before our committee together with the other officials of the Post Office Department in support of the recommendations submitted by the Post Office Department.

After conducting hearings covering a period of more than 2 months, and after careful study of the problem, the committee approved a bill, now pending before the Rules Committee that provides for increased rates so as to raise approximately $110,000,000 additional revenue.

Part of the schedules submitted by the Post Office Department were reduced largely because of the pressures that came from various sources. Also because the committee deemed some of the Department's recommendations inequitable. But do not forget this—that any amount that you do not raise under the postal bill, is going to be charged to the taxpayers of this country. I think that ought to be very definitely understood.

With reference to the question of putting off the matter of considering the raising of these rates until an investigation is made, I do not agree with that proposition because with all the economy that may be brought about, and we do hope to bring about a great deal of economy through this investigation, study, and survey, you cannot raise the entire deficit of $300,000,000. Congress must, after all, take some share of the responsibility for the increased postal deficit. Most of this deficit comes about by reason of the increases in salaries approved by this Congress within the last 2 years.

I am convinced, however, the Post Office Department can, and should be, managed in a real businesslike manner, and millions of dollars saved to the taxpayers of this country. I feel a careful study, survey, and investigation will reveal many places where economies can be made, and better service rendered to the public.

Since most of this discussion is with respect to the postal service, I want to call your attention to the fact that 78.11 percent of all Post Office Department expenditures goes for personnel; 70 percent of that personnel is employed in 256 of the 42,000 post offices in this country. It is with respect to these 256 post offices that we are to give most consideration to this phase of the problem.

Mr. Speaker, I regret my time is limited. I did want to discuss this resolution as it relates to other departments of the Government. I wanted to discuss the question of duplication of effort. The need of complete examination and investigation with respect to personnel methods as practiced in some of the departments. The question of utilization of personnel. The problem of loyalty, and how it is administered, as well as many other things that have been called to the attention to the Members of this House from time to time. Above all things we realize we are tackling a big job. We will not work wonders. We do hope to do a piece of constructive work insofar as our resources will permit.

I am sorry time did not permit me to yield to my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LYLE], one of the hard-working members of my committee.

Mr. Speaker, I do want to say a word on behalf of the membership of the committee of which I have the honor of being chairman. During the hearings on the postal bill, as well as on other bills, we have had the finest cooperation from all members. While we may have differed with respect to our opinions, it has not been on account of partisanship. The other fellow's viewpoint was respected even though it may have been different from our own. I just want it known that a high type of cooperation was shown in consideration of the postal bill.

The SPEAKER. All time has expired.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

INFORMATIONAL SERVICE, STATE DEPARTMENT

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the resolution, House Resolution 224, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Commtitee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3342) to enable the Government of the United States more effectively to carry on its foreign relations by means of promotion of the interchange of persons, knowledge, and skills between the people of the United States and other countries, and by means of public dissemination abroad of information about the United States, its people, and its policies, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Commjttee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

I now yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this rule would make in order H. R. 3342, the so-called Mundt bill.

This bill came before the Rules Committee by unanimous vote by both the subcommittee which held hearings on this matter for the Foreign Affairs Committee, and by the whole committee itself. There was not a dissenting vote.

The rule itself provides for 2 hours of debate. It waives points of order on the bill, but it is an open rule in that all amendments may be considered during the 5-minute rule.

Mr. Speaker, the so-called Mundt bill is a highly controversial measure. It is a bill which for the first time gives legislative form to certain activities of the State Department which have been carried out in the past entirely by virtue of appropriations and legislation in appropriation bills. However, this piece of enabling legislation is drawn with a number of safeguards. It has been very carefully drawn. Those safeguards were apparently inserted in the bill to meet some of the very valid objections that have been raised to the carrying out of the informational activities of the State Department. I might mention a few of those as they are of considerable importance in connection with this bill.

In the first place, there has been criticism of the type of personnel which has carried out the State Department's operations. That is very thoroughly safeguarded in this bill by requiring careful scrutiny by the FBI of every new individual, and the certification of every new individual who comes in, and certification within a 6-month period of all those who are already operating in the foreign field or in the domestic field in this informational service.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERTER. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Does it provide that they must be American citizens?

Mr. HERTER. Not entirely. Aliens are allowed only in certain exceptional cases, and I think it is a proper exception. In carrying out broadcasting activities it is not always possible to get an American citizen who can speak a foreign language—and there are some 26 foreign languages covered—without any trace of an accent and in the colloquial speech of the people themselves. It is of the utmost importance when broadcasts are made, that they ring absolutely true in the country in which they are received. The only exception allowed is in those particular cases.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will they also be examined by the FBI?

Mr. HERTER. They will certainly be examined by the FBI. There is another safeguard in the bill that is of very real importance, and that is, that every one of the separate activities that are provided for in this bill shall receive approval of the Appropriations Committee and that there shall be a separate appropriation for each one. That means, of course, that the House or the other body can scrutinize very carefully the contemplated activities, and appropriate only such money for each one as they consider appropriate.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. HERTER. I shall be glad to.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will they operate under the State Department or as a separate organization?

Mr. HERTER. Under the provisions of this bill they will operate under the State Department; but there is another provision in the bill at the very end, general supervision, which provides that the State Department must operate wherever practicable under private contract. This means that they shall get outside agencies under contract to do this work insofar as possible.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Would it not be very important to have the central intelligence agency look into the broadcasts also and pass upon them?

Mr. HERTER. That is an administrative matter which I assume is being taken care of at the present time. I know that is the way the broadcasts are being dealt with now.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Would not such a provision in the bill strengthen the idea?

Mr. HERTER. That is correct; but I think that is a detail that had better be reserved for the chairman of the subcommittee when he makes his statement.

Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of going into the details of the bill, but I do want to read to the Members of the House a very brief quotation from a Moscow radio broadcast which came to my desk yesterday morning. This was broadcast from Moscow on April 27 in Persian to the Persians and will, I think, give you some idea of the type of propaganda that we are facing in foreign countries all over the world.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself two additional minutes.

This is what Radio Moscow says:

> History * * * shows missionaries often paved the way for * * * conquerors. At present * * * missionaries are (being) sent * * * to Europe. For instance, a man called John Meloney introduces himself as a representative of American world federalists in Sweden. * * * World federalists (are) carrying out propaganda with a view to suppressing the sovereignty of all countries and to bring them into union with the United States under a federation the central government of which would rest with the United States.
> * * * According to Meloney's admission, the majority of supporters of this particular movement are in the United States and * * * much less in other countries. We can see from this admission that American missionaries have no supporters in Europe, and this is not astonishing because few people would consent to sacrifice their national independence to the trans-Atlantic god.

This is the type of propaganda which is being disseminated all over the world. We can ignore it if we like because we feel we are entirely innocent of any such crazy suggestions as appear in this particular broadcast. On the other hand, the rest of the world knows comparatively little about the United States; and in the ideological war that is going on today and that everyone of us must admit is one of the most serious that civilization ever faced, I, for my part, feel that it is proper for the State Department to meet it. Provided its administration is properly safeguarded, as I think is done in this bill, provided it is administered with skill and with intelligence, this activity can be of the utmost help to this country in the very serious situation in which the world finds itself.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

PERMISSION TO COMMITTEE ON DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA TO SIT UNTIL NOON TOMORROW

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that notwithstanding the fact the House meets at 11 o'clock tomorrow, the Committee on the District of Columbia may continue its session until noon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

INFORMATIONAL SERVICE, STATE DEPARTMENT

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may use.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

NEED PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN OF OUR OWN

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts that it is absolutely necessary that we should combat such propaganda and radio broadcasts as he has just read to us. I believe the bill made in order by this rule will do that. At least that is its purpose, as I understand it, and I am pleased to be in position to favor the adoption of the rule as well as the bill.

Mr. Speaker, this bill not only aims at bringing home to the people of the world the advantages of our democratic form of government, but also to engender a better and more friendly relationship with all nations.

TRULY AN ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

It will also give us an opportunity to display to the world our most up-to-date types of machinery, tools, automobiles, tractors, and other manufactured products. To that extent what is proposed in this bill may be rightly termed an advertising program. And we will all admit that advertising pays. Our wisest business minds have developed great corporations by advertising and publicity to familiarize the people with their products.

It may be true that in the past one or two of the releases or the radio programs of the Department of State fell somewhat short of perfection. I am not, like some of my colleagues on the Republican side of the aisle, an expert in every field. I do know that not even the largest commercial advertisers always hit it right. They even make mistakes. Even the high-salaried publicity staff of the Republican National Committee sometimes makes a mistake.

NO ONE IS PERFECT

As you can see, no man is infallible, and no one is perfect.

We may well look to what other countries are doing in this respect. Due to a world-wide advertising program before the war, Germany excelled our country and every country in its export business and won markets away from all. The British Board of Trade and almost every government except our own carried on a world-wide advertising and promotional campaign for tourists and sales and good will.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation aims for the establishing of constructive and peaceful—not destructive and warlike—American programs and policies. While the wages of American workmen are high in relation to the earnings of workers in foreign countries, we can compete with other countries and even undersell them because of our industrial ingenuity and efficiency and the high production per man in American manufacturing, notwithstanding the false charges made against American workers.

The Army and the Navy, year in and year out, spend not millions but billions in devising and producing new destructive weapons of war, perfecting new defenses, and building up our armed services, all tending to war. The few million dollars to be authorized for appropriation in this bill will be used to promote better understanding and good will between our country and other countries, and will be a constructive step toward peace and friendship.

For 40 years I have sought increases in the appropriations for our State and Commerce Departments to foster friendly political and commercial relations with foreign nations.

FAVORS STUDENT EXCHANGES

Thirty-six years ago I supported the effort of our former Governor of Illinois, the Honorable Frank O. Lowden, who was deprived of the Republican nomination for President by the conniving of the Harding gang to the misfortune of the whole country, in his proposal to exchange our students with those of foreign lands.

We have witnessed the benefits of having foreign students in our schools and universities, and of having our students in other countries. They have each gained a new respect and tolerance for the others' lands, but always the foreign students in America have been our best salesmen abroad.

Having learned about our machinery and our industrial methods, they are "sold" on our ways and on the value and quality of our products, and are eager to sell them to their own countries.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of the rule which makes this meritorious bill in order for consideration, and I hope the bill will pass the House by an overwhelming majority.

EDITORS' COMMITTEE SUPPORTS PROGRAM

Some time ago, Mr. Speaker, I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the full text of the excellent and exhaustive favorable report made by a special investigating committee of the National Society of Newspaper Editors.

Now I find that some of those investigators were so impressed by what they found during the investigation that they have associated themselves with a new organization of outstanding editors, publicists, and civic leaders to support the American information program. It gives me pleasure to insert here the June 3 letter of the Committee for United States Information Abroad, with offices here in Washington, together with the names shown on the letterhead:

COMMITTEE FOR UNITED STATES INFORMATION ABROAD,
Washington, D. C., June 3, 1947.

The Honorable ADOLPH J. SABATH,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SABATH: The Committee for United States Information Abroad has been formed by a group of citizens who have learned from personal experience that it is important to explain ourselves to foreign countries. To quote General Eisenhower, in his statement in support of the Mundt bill, we are "constantly struck by the appalling ignorance that exists throughout the world about the United States; things that we take so much for granted that we do not even think about them are completely unknown to much of the world."

We think it is vital to tell the people of the world what the people of the United States are like, how they live, what they think, what they believe. It is vital to share our knowledge with them, and bring theirs to us.

The United States policy of extending aid to free nations makes no sense unless we also export American ideas. We are convinced that if the true purposes of the United States are known and understood around the world that we will have friends around the world. We are also convinced that if we allow any distortion of those purposes and ideals through propaganda around the world, without correction, then the responsibility for that distortion and the danger it represents is partly ours.

The United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1947, H. R. 3342, known as the Mundt bill, provides the basis for continuing a constructive program, including the exchange of students, teachers, and technical persons abroad, as well as the Voice of America broadcasts.

We are well aware that there have been criticisms of part of the activities now carried on by the State Department. We think also there may be certain changes needed in the proposed legislation. Such corrections can be made without altering the purpose of the bill. It is most urgent now to take necessary steps to avoid complete disruption of the program.

We, therefore, strongly urge you to support this legislation, as requested by Secretary of State Marshall.

Sincerely yours,

(Chairman Ralph McGill, Thurman L. Barnard, Edward Barrett, Barry Bingham, Julien Bryan, Cass Canfield, William Carr, Arthur H. Compton, Louis G. Cowan, Gardner Cowles, Jonathan Daniels, John S. HEARST FINANCIAL EDITOR ALSO FAVORS FOREIGN INFORMATION PROGRAM

Then this morning I received from my old friend, Robert P. Vanderpoel, financial editor of the Chicago Herald-American, a copy of his June 2, 1947, column in which he quotes with approval a statement by a highly respected Chicago banker. To save space I am inserting only a condensation of this column, but I hope gentlemen here will read it:

STRONG URGES EXPORTS TO BOLSTER UNITED STATES TRADE

(By Robert P. Vanderpoel)

A. M. Strong, vice president in charge of the foreign department of the American National Bank & Trust Co. of Chicago, and chairman of the World Trade Forum of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, declares that the export business "is becoming very important, because the domestic demands for our products are beginning to diminish."

* * * * *

The United States now possesses more than 50 percent of the world's industrial capacity, with only 6½ percent of the world's population. * * *

SHORTAGES PERSIST

There is no question about the foreign demand. There might be some argument, however, relative to our own industrial capacity. * * *

Of more fundamental importance is the unbalanced state of trade, which appears to be growing worse rather than better.

The demand for American dollars from almost all parts of the world is terrific and the dollars are not available for purchase of our goods in part because we still place difficulties in the way of merchandise shipped into this country.

The United States is fast becoming a have-not nation as far as precious mineral resources are concerned.

What are we doing about it?

NEED CRACK BUYERS

The sound thing, obviously, would be to send crack American buyers to every corner of the globe to buy these metals. This would give us what we need and give foreign nations some of the dollars they need. (We wouldn't have to provide them in the form of loans and gifts.)

Instead, we continue to prevent the importation of many metals by means of high tariffs and even now a bill is being debated in Congress which would authorize the expenditure of $80,000,000, not to bring in foreign minerals but to further exploit our rapidly diminishing supplies through the granting of subsidies. Clearly this would merely bring us to the poverty stage more quickly.

Meanwhile, dispatches from all parts of the world indicate growing resentment at the unsound economic policies which this country continues to follow.

Every economist in the world knows that we are building unsoundly.

SHOULD READ DUN'S REVIEW ON POTENTIAL RUSSIAN TRADE

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I have also just received, and I presume every other Member likewise received, the May issue of Dun's Review, published by Dun & Bradstreet.

I urge everyone here to read in that issue the leading article entitled "Opportunities for Russian Trade Expansion," by E. C. Ropes, showing the wonderful opportunities of doing a profitable business with Russia.

When Representatives who consistently speak for profit-hungry business read this, perhaps they will subside somewhat, discontinue their discord, and urge a more friendly relationship with one of our very best customers.

Mr. Ropes shows that America began trading with Russia in 1780; that the U. S. S. R. established a good credit record during the 1920's on long-term credits extended chiefly by British and German firms; that only the stringency of the world-wide panic marred the credit record, which was rapidly redeemed after the depth of the depression passed; and that since the early 1930's American trade with Russia has rapidly outdistanced every other country and is still growing, with opportunities for a richly profitable export trade with Russia of more than $100,000,000 this year even without extension of dollar credits.

SENATE

(Legislative day of Monday, April 21, 1947)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, our Heavenly Father, restore our faith in the ultimate triumph of Thy plan for the world Thou hast made. In spite of present difficulties, our disappointments and our fears, reassure us that Thou art still in control. When we become frustrated and give up, remind us that Thou art still holding things together, waiting and working and watching. When we make mistakes, help us to remember that Thou dost not give up on us. Forbid it, Lord, that we should give up on Thee and forget that all things work together for good to them that love Thee.

Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. LANGER and Mr. CHAVEZ members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

The following report of a committee was submitted:

By Mr. AIKEN, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments:

S. 140. A bill to create an executive department of the Government to be known as the Department of Health, Education, and Security; with an amendment (Rept. No. 242).

NOMENCLATURE IN THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE (S. REPT. NO. 243)

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, I ask unanimous consent to submit a report of that committee relating to nomenclature in the executive branch and request that it be printed and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was received, ordered to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTRODUCTION

Recent studies of Government structure by this committee, especially those conducted in connection with a chart recently published depicting the organization of Federal executive departments and agencies, shows a startling heterogeneity. The organization chart shows 2,370 principal parts, of which 79 are bureaus, 83 are sections, 128 are services, 119 are branches, 549 are offices, and 628 are divisions. There are 16 other names for principal parts used from 3 to 57 times in the executive branch. There are 458 names which are too diversified to classify.

We realize full well that a name is not going to make a unit of the Government operate more or less efficiently. However, the confusion of names makes it difficult for everyone concerned with government to know precisely what is meant when a certain title or term is used. A division in one department may be a relatively small and unimportant organization, whereas in another it may be very important. All division chiefs do not receive the same salaries nor have comparable responsibilities. The same comment applies to the majority of other organization units.

The committee feels very strongly that this confusion in nomenclature should be eliminated and that this action would have several advantages.

THE PLAN

The committee makes the following recommendations:

1. That the following nomenclature and organizational structure be used in all Government departments: Department, bureau, division, branch, section, unit.

2. That all new organizations created within the executive branch be placed within the framework of existing departments.

3. That all Members of Congress having occasion to prepare legislation which will create new organizations in the departments or which will rename or reorganize existing ones use the above nomenclature and organization structure.

BENEFITS

1. Such a standard basis would assist all persons having contact with the Government in knowing at what level they were dealing, i. e., they would know that a bureau is always the principal component of a department, and that a division is always the principal component of a bureau. It would also make it possible to determine accurately at what level in the organization it would be necessary to deal in order to have policy decisions made.

2. This action would assist the Civil Service Commission in its classification system and eliminate some of the seemingly endless confusion caused by a multiplicity of titles and the sometimes unwarranted assumption of authority by a person whose title is good but whose position is actually weak.

3. The committee plans to do all in its power, not only to regularize the naming of newly created units, but also to change nomenclature within established departments and agencies. This program of itself will necessarily result in a closer scrutiny of the organization of the executive branch and should force a good many useless units out of existence.

COMMENTS

There are a great variety of names of organization units from which selection could be made. However, we believe that those which are listed herein have the most significance and the most universal acceptance. It is doubtful whether any department would ever have use for more than five suborganizations in descending order of importance. There is no doubt that much opposition will be forthcoming from old, well-established units which have great pride in their present designations. However, this must be disregarded for the common good. It may also be pointed out that some confusion will at first result from a changing of names, but it cannot be avoided and it is believed that it will straighten out in a short time.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

The Secretary of the Senate reported that on today, June 6, 1947, he presented

LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3020) to prescribe fair and equitable rules of conduct to be observed by labor and management in their relations with one another which affect commerce, to protect the rights of individual workers in their relations with labor organizations whose activities affect commerce, to recognize the paramount public interest in labor disputes affecting commerce that endanger the public health, safety, or welfare, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I desire to express my opposition to the conference report on the so-called Taft-Hartley bill, which is now the pending question before the Senate.

During the debate which preceded the adoption in the Senate of S. 1126, known as the Taft-Ball-Smith bill, which is the foundation of this legislation, I and many of my colleagues whose views coincide with mine expressed our opposition to this proposal at great length. We condemned this proposed legislation because of its extreme punitive, repressive, and generally antilabor character. We pointed out that it was, by its expressed provisions and by all its implications, designed and intended to convert the Wagner Labor Relations Act into an instrumentality to harass and weaken labor unions, to upset the Norris-LaGuardia Act, and generally to utilize the Government of the United States and its courts to break down the strength, security, and usefulness of labor unions in America.

While this legislation was under debate, I joined with a group of Senators, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. McGRATH], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], in proposing an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which was designed to remedy all the actual evils to be found in the field of labor relations without undertaking to emasculate any of the sound labor laws which with great care had been built up in this country over the years. The measure which we proposed would provide additional facilities for the mediation of labor disputes affecting commerce and equalize legal responsibilities of labor organizations and employers. It incorporated the complete program laid down by President Truman in his State of the Union message to remedy all actual abuses which were found to exist, without producing chaotic conditions in the field of labor relations.

During the debate we pointed out that, at a time when the United States should be giving the world an example of freedom and democracy in action as an alternative to communism and totalitarianism, the harsh measure which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] and his cosponsors were seeking to enact would be used by sinister forces at home and abroad to justify slanderous attacks upon American democratic institutions and our treatment of workers. I think we successfully demonstrated that the passage of such punitive legislation would be used to justify charges that, in a world which had been torn asunder by war, with starvation and economic and political unrest spreading over the earth, and with people everywhere yearning for peace and freedom, America, the only stabilizing force left in the world, was breaking up into warring camps of workers and employers. We made clear our view that, in such a crucial period, this legislation would undermine our bipartisan foreign policy and alienate the sympathy of millions of workers throughout the world for American institutions.

In its domestic aspects we voiced our fear that this bill, as did the British Trade Union Disputes Act of 1926, would drive trade unionists and workers to more radical and extreme leadership and policies. We reiterated our conviction that this vindictive, antilabor legislation settled no problems, provided no answers, and would lead our country up a blind alley of litigation, uncertainty, domestic strife, and reaction. We showed that, by weakening the purchasing power and economic position of the great mass of consumers, it would hurry us along the road to a dangerous depression.

Mr. President, during that debate we further pointed out how the bill, before it went to conference, weakened the rights guaranteed by, and effective administration of, the Wagner Act; how it would make a delusion of the Norris-LaGuardia Act; the respects in which it would frustrate the work of the Department of Labor; and how it would strike at collective bargaining on such vital issues as the closed shop, the union shop, health and welfare funds, and the check-off. We showed that the detailed and burdensome reports which unions would be required to file with the Department of Labor were so overwhelming that compliance was impossible of achievement, and that the penalty for noncompliance—denial of access to the National Labor Relations Board—was merely another way of demanding that unions resort to strikes rather than the orderly processes of law. We have wondered that rational men could not foresee the inevitable result of this legislation—weak and irresponsible unions with no powers of discipline over their members, legalisms and red tape frustrating the efforts of the Government to solve serious problems, uncertainty in the front office and the plant, inevitable bitterness between workers and employers, lower pay rolls and less production from embittered and disillusioned workers. For a few months, perhaps, higher profits as industry takes advantage of its reasserted dominance—and then, a crash.

In the meantime, the Senate has heard from the American people. From certain sections of big business and monopoly comes a guarded approval, tinged with doubts concerning our economic future and the utility of this legislation. From the union halls—A. F. of L., CIO, Railway Brotherhoods, and independents—comes a united protest as the repressive hand of law is laid upon settled rights and liberties won for labor after long years of destructive warfare and chaos in labor relations. This is America speaking — American workers and their families denouncing this shameful effort to make the great mass of American people second-class citizens and placing the privileged few in the saddle so that they may dictate the future of our economic and political system. This was tried in the 1920's and failed. It will fail again.

This bill, Mr. President, constitutes a declaration that the National Association of Manufacturers is to be the unquestioned spokesman of our economic system; that labor is to be put in its place, stripped of many of its essential rights, and so battered and weakened as to be ineffective hereafter at the bargaining table. I wonder if this can be done in free America. Perhaps not. The workers are aroused. Mass meetings are being called, parades are to be held in the big industrial centers, and bitter imprecations are being hurled at the Congress. Every Senator here is aware of these facts. And now a real choice must be made.

A chill apprehension has spread over the country, as we recall recent European history. In Italy, in Germany, and elsewhere, antilabor legislation was the prelude to fascism. Inevitably labor will seek to elude the chains fashioned for it. This means conflict and chaos between labor and management as long as this effort to gain dominant power continues.

In view of the widespread confusion which we face in the world and the economic and political unrest already developing at home, one would have supposed that the Congress would have sought to work out a bill which would correct all recognized evils in the relations of labor and management and lead to the development of a spirit of cooperation, harmony, and high production. I regret that the contrary has occurred. Already groaning under a burden of repressive provisions, a long list of restraints was added to the Taft-Hartley bill in conference. Let us examine these changes since the bill was passed in the Senate.

WEAKENING OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT

The conferees amended section 2 (2) to change the definition of employer, which now includes "anyone acting in the interest of an employer" to read: "acting as an agent of an employer." This change may well be interpreted to mean that an employer is now responsible for the acts of his foremen or superintendents only when he specifically authorizes their antilabor activity. This is contrary to well-settled law. Obviously, such specific authority is difficult or impossible of proof. This technicality will provide a ready defense for employers in a variety of circumstances. As Mr. Justice Douglas pointed out in International Association of Machinists v. N. L. R. B. (311 U. S. 72, at p. 80) for a unanimous Supreme Court:

> The employer, however, may be held to have assisted the formation of a union even though the acts of the so-called agents were not expressly authorized or might not be attributable to him on a strict application of the rules of respondeat superior. We are dealing here * * * with a clear legislative policy to free the collective-bargaining process from all taint of an employer's compulsion, domination, or influence.

By section 4 (d) the conferees provide that the Board shall have a general counsel, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, who is not only to supervise the legal work of the Board, but all employees in regional offices as well, in addition to supervising all investigations and issuance of complaints.

The effect of this provision is to set up a labor czar within the National Labor Relations Board. A single individual will exercise not only complete power over all the Board's legal work, properly defined, but over most of its administrative work as well. One person will determine when complaints shall issue in all cases, how investigation shall be conducted, how cases shall be tried, which cases shall be enforced. Much of this action will not be subject to appeal, either to the Board or the courts. Any discipline of this individual is precluded by making him a Presidential appointee, subject to Senate confirmation, removable only for clear malfeasance in office. No real power is vested in the Board in order that their collective common sense may be brought to bear on these serious problems. The whole purpose of the administrative process, that uniform policies may prevail at all levels of work, is thereby frustrated.

Such unity of command is particularly important where, as in this bill, so many new and varied tasks are entrusted to an administrative agency. Coordination in policy is essential in order that rules and regulations, prosecutions, and decisions maintain some consistency. If the public, businessmen, and trade-unions are to operate their affairs, they have the right to know what the law means in the eyes of its administrators. This proposal vests unwieldy and dictatorial power in a single individual.

Section 7 of the act is amended to give employees "the right to refrain from any or all of such activities"—meaning joining a union and bargaining collectively. Since they have that right now, nothing is accomplished by the change. Who is it that desires that workers refrain from union activities? You and I know—their employers. Yet the Senate is now asked solemnly to undertake to guarantee a right which employers have effectively policed.

We have heard much—far more than the facts warrant—about union irresponsibility. Yet the conferees have adopted provisions which effectively deny unions any chance to attain responsibility. Under section 8 (b) (2) a union may not demand the discharge of, and under section 8 (a) (3) an employer may not discharge, an employee for nonmembership in a union unless such nonmembership arises from a failure to pay dues. If a union member leads a wildcat strike, is a Communist, or a labor spy, or steals the union's funds, he may not be discharged upon demand of the union. Is this a means to industrial harmony, to require men to continue working with persons whom they justifiably spurn?

In my judgment, one of the fatal steps taken by the conferees was to adopt the House provision respecting freedom of speech. We noted in our minority report on Senate bill 1126 that the definition of free speech adopted by the Senate was sound and workable. But now the conferees have adopted a provision which states that the "expressing of any views shall not constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice under any of the provisions of this act" unless it contains a threat or promise of benefit. If what an employer or a trade unionist says may not be used in evidence, how is any case under this bill ever to be proved? Through careless draftsmanship, such statements are apparently incompetent as evidence only if in written, printed, graphic, or visual form, though I assume that oral statements are also to be excluded. This provision is like saying that because one has the right to express hostility to another, such a statement is not admissible in a murder trial. No comparable rule, I am certain, has ever been adopted for any type of proceedings.

The conferees, by changing the language of section 9 (c) (4), have prohibited the Board from holding pre-hearing elections, and conducting consent cross-checks of pay rolls against union cards; both of them useful and appropriate devices in cases presenting no substantial issues. By the adoption of section 9 (c) (5), they have precluded unions from starting collective bargaining until an entire business is organized, which is, as in the case of Nation-wide insurance companies, frequently impossible.

I have already criticized those provisions of the bill which require unions to file burdensome and extensive reports with the Secretary of Labor as a condition to invoking the services of the National Labor Relations Board. Now the conferees have added a new provision, which demands, in addition, under section 9 (f) (6), a detailed description of the procedures followed by unions at every step of their activity.

These requirements are so burdensome that it would be an incompetent employer's attorney indeed who could not find some failure to comply with them. The result is that we shut off, on demand of any party, access to the machinery of the Labor Board. Whom does that benefit? Do we prefer that men strike rather than vote? The bill imposes such restrictions on access to the Board's machinery that its use by unions must shortly cease, and it is notable that employers need not file any data with the Secretary of Labor—or anyone else—to obtain an injunction or file a charge.

Another respect in which the conferees have worsened the measure by making resort to the peaceful processes of the Government difficult is found in the provisions of section 9 (h) dealing with the Communist issue. I am convinced that these provisions will strengthen communism within the labor movement rather than weakening it. Here, again, if a labor organization has a Communist officer the right of the union to seek the processes of the Board is gone; it must be emphasized that the right is removed not alone from the Communists within the union but from all the union members—whether they are anti-Communist, non-Communist, or Communist. Those persons who have worked most stanchly to rid the labor movement of communism thereby suffer greatly for their Americanism. The real sufferers will be those who have been fighting communism in trade unions, for as a result of Communist insistence on retaining their positions, the unions to which they belong are denied the peaceful processes of the Government.

Section 11 of the bill makes mandatory the issuance of subpoenas by the Board upon the request of any party, except that the person subpoenaed may within 5 days ask that the subpoena be revoked. Here, again, I insist that in their zeal to hamper trade unions and the National Labor Relations Board, the conferees have done the citizen a disservice. Instead of requiring that such applications be screened to determine whether the material sought is relevant and accurately described before issuance of the subpoena, the citizen is now required to put himself to the trouble of answering any and every useless demand which may be made on him, after service of the subpoena. This is another of those joker provisions which employers, like other citizens, will regret if this bill ever becomes law.

Section 209 (b) requires that the Board take a ballot within 15 days after a board of inquiry has reported in a strike affecting the national health or safety on the question whether the employees wish to accept the final offer of settlement made by their employer as stated by him. In short, on the issue whether there is to be a strike, the employer is given by the conferees an absolute and unlimited discretion to frame the question as he wishes. Any Senator who had the power to frame the form of the questions on which we vote would be an extremely important individual; every person who is familiar with public surveys knows that the form of the question determines the answer. But here, with no penalty for falsification or error, the employer may frame the question as he wishes; neither the employees nor the union nor the Government is even consulted on what will often be the critical issue.

The processes of the Board are further weakened by the conferees by the addition of a new provision in section 10 (b) requiring that hearings before the Board shall be conducted, so far as practicable, in accordance with the rules of evidence used in the district courts, which replaces a provision presently in the act that "rules of evidence should not be controlling." The provision contained in the National Labor Relations Act is not unique; we have adopted it as a matter of course in setting up every administrative agency. And there is a reason for this. In the district courts most cases are heard before juries, and there are many rules of evidence which are designed solely to keep improper influences from the jury. On the other hand, in hearings before professional and trained judges or examiners, such rules are invariably dispensed with. Only in the case of the National Labor Relations Board is it proposed to depart from the well-settled rules governing administrative bodies, though nothing has been developed to warrant such discrimination.

All of these provisions have been added by the conferees; they are in addition to those other hampering restrictions placed on the Board by the original bill, every one of which the conferees retained. Those provisions included the unjustifiable 6-month statute of limitations, the abolition of the review section, a new and discriminatory standard of judicial review, the favoring of company unions, hampering restrictions upon election procedures, the exclusion of supervisors from all benefits under the act, and many others which have already been brought to the attention of the Senate.

Can anyone boasting allegiance to the principles of liberty and freedom survey the littered wreckage of the Wagner Act, which remains as a memorial to a gallant effort to bring democracy to our working people, and take pride in such vandalism?

I turn now to the impact of the conferees' efforts upon the rights and functions of trade unions.

WEAKENING OF TRADE-UNIONS AND INTERFERENCE IN THEIR AFFAIRS

Under section 8 (3) of this bill, the conferees have eliminated the possibility of union responsibility. One cannot, of course, quarrel with the purpose of subsection (A) of the proviso which is, in substance, to forbid an employer or a union to discriminate against an employee because of his race or color, or national origin by providing that, to justify a discharge, it must be shown that membership in the union was available to the employee on the same terms and conditions generally applicable to other members. But this provision takes an enormous forward step in the direction of regulating the employment practices of industry, and the exclusion practices of unions, without any adequate study having been given the matter. It is unhappily true that in certain sections of our country, race prejudices are strong and deep. With time and education they will, I am sure, disappear; and there are encouraging signs looking in that direction. But, despite my conviction that the sooner we can eliminate race and religious prejudice the better, I hesitate to approve so vital a step at this time as making the Federal Government the overseer of employer and union practices in all the States.

Under section 8 (b) (2) it is made an unfair labor practice for a union to cause or attempt to cause an employer to discharge an employee for the same reasons; these problems are delicate and sensitive, and I feel confident that such blunderbuss treatment is not the proper answer. The junior Senator from New York [Mr. IVES] has himself stated publicly on many occasions that he feels that persuasion and education are better remedies in this field than legal sanctions.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. IVES. I wish merely to remark that before the debate is completed I shall have more to say on this subject than I have already said.

Mr. MURRAY. I thank the Senator. I am sure that whatever he has to say will be very helpful in the consideration of this problem.

Subsection (B) of the proviso is clearly unwise; its force has been strengthened by the elimination of subsection (C), which was contained in the bill as it passed the Senate. Under subsection (C) formerly in the bill, dual union activity was confined to the period at the close of the contract period; it is now protected at all times. Subsection (B) now forbids an employer to discharge an employee who has been dropped from the union for any reason other than his failure to pay dues, and such an individual is, of course, entitled to back pay and reinstatement if the section is violated.

Let us consider what this means. Suppose that the Communists in the labor movement again decide, as they did in the early thirties, to set up a new and independent set of trade unions. If, for doing, so, they were discharged from a responsible union, the employer would not be allowed to discharge them, and under section 8 (b) (2) it would be n unfair labor practice for a union to seek their discharge. Or consider the case of an employee who had consistently led wildcat strikes or engaged in other conduct disruptive of trade-union discipline; the employer may not discharge him; the union may not seek his discharge. A labor spy, an agent provocateur, a criminal or habitual drunkard are all protected under this provision. Employers pay a heavy price for the resulting internal disruption of the union, for they must also retain these persons on their pay rolls.

But if these intrusions into the legitimate affairs of employers and trade unions are unwarranted, consider the restrictions on trade unions under section 8 (b) (4) which make it an unfair labor practice to engage in a strike or boycott where an object is to engage in certain specified conduct to which I shall come in a moment. Let me direct attention to that little word "an." For many generations the courts have followed what is known as the primary objectives test; even prior to the passage of the Norris-LaGuardia Act the courts had developed a doctrine that they would look to the primary objective of the strike rather than to all its objectives. Manifestly, different strikers have differing motives; any strike may have several different objects. Those limitations, imposed by the Supreme Court in the early part of the century when it was considered by many to be hostile to the purposes of trade unions, is by that single word repealed. We are no longer to look to the primary motive; it is enough if it can be proved that any striker has an improper motive, or that an extremely minor and subsidiary issue in the strike was improper. Under section 303 (a) of the bill the same language is used and unions are therefore liable for damages as well as being guilty of unfair labor practices in such circumstances.

The improper objects, which we have previously criticized in our discussion of S. 1126, include engaging in any secondary boycott. I am certain that many Senators recall, as I do, the protests which greeted the decision of the Supreme Court in the Bedford Cut Stone case during the First World War, in which the Supreme Court convicted under the antitrust acts some stone masons in San Francisco who had refused to set stone quarried by underpaid nonunion labor in Indiana. Among other factors, that decision was responsible for the passage of the Norris-LaGuardia Act; it was universally denounced as governmental interference in a perfectly legitimate trade-union practice to raise the living standards of the people. Now it is to become illegal. Can anyone suppose that memories are so short, or that public opinion has so radically changed, that the first decisions under this provision will not provoke a wave of protest?

The conferees have hampered and restricted the normal activities of trade unions by creating two new unfair-labor practices, not in the bill as passed by the Senate, which are of great importance. A new section 8 (b) (5) forbids unions to charge fees for membership in an amount which the Board finds excessive or discriminatory under all the circumstances. This is a wide open door to governmental regulation of all union affairs. In determining what is excessive or discriminatory, it is obvious that among other factors the Board must consider the needs of the union for funds. If the Board happens to disagree with the terms of a union pension fund, or feels that any union officer is receiving too high a salary, or finds that mileage rates allowed are too high—in short, if it is in disagreement with any union expenditure, it must find that the fee is excessive or discriminatory. The Board is thereby made, in effect, the Budget Bureau for the trade-union movement. Such governmental power to direct how, when, and for what, labor unions shall spend their funds is exactly what made the Nazi labor front a going organization.

The other new unfair labor practice is that with respect to so-called featherbedding. Under a new section 8 (6) it is an unfair labor practice to force or require an employer to pay or deliver or agree to pay or deliver any money or other thing of value, in the nature of an exaction, for services which are not performed or not to be performed. Let me observe at the outset that what is featherbedding to an employer is invariably something else to the workers. Most frequently such provisions are designed to protect the safety of the workers; many of the contract terms covering railway workers which are claimed to be featherbedding actually had their origin, and continue to have a justification, in safeguarding the life and health of the workers. Full-crew provisions, automatic-coupler requirements, required signal and watchman protections, are examples.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. McGRATH. I note that the Senator is referring to the railway industry. It is my understanding that railway unions are exempt from the provisions of this statute. Am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. MURRAY. I am not certain that they are.

Mr. McGRATH. As I recall, the original act, the National Labor Relations Act, with which we were dealing in considering the pending measure, provided that the railroad unions would be exempt from its provisions.

Mr. MURRAY. They may be exempt under its provisions, but I am using some activities in the railroad industry to illustrate so-called featherbedding.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. IVES. The answer to the question raised by the Senator from Rhode Island is "Yes."

Mr. MURRAY. That railroad labor unions are completely eliminated from the provisions of the law?

Mr. IVES. The Railway Labor Act is outside the purview of this bill.

Mr. MURRAY. Yes, I understand that was the effect of the bill as it passed the Senate.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. McGRATH. It is my understanding that that was understood when the matter was originally before us. The thought occurred to me, in listening to the discussion by the very eminent Senator from Montana, that by the incorporation of these restrictive provisions with respect to other types of labor we are making rather an unfair distinction between American labor unions. The railroads and railroad systems can do certain things that other employees are prohibited by Federal law from doing. I am wondering if someone can enlighten us on the justification for that sort of distinction.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. IVES. I think the Senator from Rhode Island will find that there is nothing unfair in what is being eliminated by that process. There is nothing unfair in the procedure being followed for the elimination of abuses.

Mr. McGRATH. But may I ask the Senator from New York this question: If we do not eliminate such practices with respect to railway workers—in other words, railway workers may engage in these very practices without being in violation of Federal law—is it not unfair to provide that employees in other industries will be in violation of the law if they engage in such practices?

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. IVES. I am not upholding in any way, shape, or manner any practice which is contrary to the ideas set forth in this bill or contrary to the principles being laid down, but I am saying that the matters to which the Senator from Montana has referred are not covered by this bill.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I want to point out that railway labor has never been covered by the Wagner Act; it has always been covered by the Railway Labor Act, which provides a somewhat different procedure. We saw no reason to change that situation, because there were no abuses which had arisen in connection with the operation of the Railway Labor Act. In general, we confined our amendments to the bill to acts which, from evidence before the committee, were specifically shown to be abuses.

Mr. MURRAY. I am referring to the so-called feather-bedding activities in the railroad industry as illustrations of matters that may be insisted upon by workers as a matter of safety for the protection of their health and life. I am merely using them as illustrations of so-called "feather bedding" which can be justified.

In the mining industry the stationing of men to handle ventilation equipment or to conduct inspections are demanded by the men for their protection. More often, perhaps, these union requirements are directed at the speed-up; there is a limit to physical endurance and many employers have in the past, and would be willing again, to work their men beyond that point did not provisions in the contracts protect them. Speed-up in the automobile industry which existed prior to organization was the main grievance of the workers. Frequently unions impose these conditions for the economic security of their members. Where employment is sporadic and highly skilled the maintenance of the industry itself may demand that men be paid for services not to be performed. We do not cut off the pay of our generals in time of peace; we do not pay a lighthousekeeper only when he is trimming the lamps; we do not pay a watchman only while engaged in the business of catching criminals. This provision is merely a demand that the risks of job insecurity, intermittent employment, and slack be borne by the workers entirely and not by industry. It is of a piece with that industrial practice which in times of depression lays off the men in the shop without even reducing the salary of the vice president.

A new provision added by the conferees seems designed to weaken materially the unions' power to bargain collectively. Section 8 (a) (5) has been amended to provide that the duty to bargain collectively shall not be construed as requiring either party "to discuss or agree to any modification of the terms and conditions contained in a contract for a fixed period." Collective bargaining is a continuing process; it is not achieved once the contract has been signed, for serious questions arise, and always will arise, concerning the meaning and application of the contract. We do not conclude a problem by legislating about it; the statute must still be applied, interpreted, and enforced. If, in practice, a provision in a statute proves unwise, we do not preclude persons from discussing with us changes. So in industrial life, obviously one would not require an employer to agree to change an agreement upon demand, but what harm can it do to discuss the matter? Here, again, the conferees have lightly reversed a well-settled rule, frequently passed on by the courts after careful study, for no explainable reason.

With no instructions from either House, as is true of most of the changes I am discussing, the conferees have adopted a new rule with respect to plant guards in section 9 (b), denying them rights under present legislation. This is merely a petulant gesture at the Supreme Court which decided, while the conferees were in session, that plant guards were employees and entitled to the benefits of national labor legislation. I have here no time to discuss the merits of this issue, which are fully set forth in the opinions of the Supreme Court; but since there was no demand for such provisions at the time this bill was voted on by the Senate, it has no justification other than a wish to belittle a tribunal which is a coordinate branch of this Government and, as such, is entitled to the respect of the Congress.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. By the provision of the House bill plant guards were completely excluded from the Wagner Act. We compromised with the House by providing that they should have the protection of the Wagner Act, but in a separate unit from the workers in the plants. That is certainly a change—although a minor one, nevertheless a reasonable one—and certainly it is a compromise with the extreme position taken by the House.

Mr. MURRAY. Yes; it is a change, but it is not a change that is necessary for any reason that I know of. It was simply put in arbitrarily.

Mr. TAFT. Let me call the Senator's attention to the further fact that the Supreme Court's opinion to which the Senator has referred was only a 5-to-4 opinion, and the dissenting opinion was about as good as the majority opinion.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I have already adverted to the burdensome registration requirements which unions are compelled to comply with as a condition precedent to seeking the dubious privilege of resort to the machinery of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. I invite the Members of the Senate to read those provisions, contained in section 9 (f) and (g) and to ask themselves the candid question whether any union could successfully comply with those requirements—which I have not even the time to read—under the close scrutiny of all employers' attorneys. These requirements have been made far more rigorous by the conferees' addition of subsection (6), which requires regular reports, kept up to date, concerning qualifications for membership, elections of officers and stewards, calling of regular and special meetings, levying of assessments, imposition of fines, authorizations for bargaining demands, ratification of contracts, authorization for strikes, authorization for disbursement of funds, audits of financial transactions, participation in insurance plans, and expulsion of members and the grounds therefor. Since no organization could conceivably be current with respect to such a mass of detailed requirements, it is evident that no union will be able to resort to governmental machinery. It is ironic that the proponents of this measure think that they hurt unions by encouraging them not to use governmental processes. The people who are hurt are employers and the public who pay the price of the resulting strikes.

Finally the right of men not to be discharged for their union activities is impaired by the work of the conferees. In section 10 (c) they added a new provision which states that the Board shall not order the reinstatement of, or direct back pay for, any individual discharged for cause. Surely the Senate knows that employers who wish to discharge workers for their union activities do not, except in the rarest cases, announce the real reasons for the discharge. It is the almost invariable practice to await a pretext—some violation of rules, some error in judgment, some casual misstep of the union leader—and then discharge him for that. There is "cause" in such a discharge, even though, if these slips are committed by nonunion men, discharge never occurs. So the conferees, having weakened every other provision of the National Labor Relations Act, have now put a knife through its heart, for the right not to be fired for union activities is the real heart of the act.

Mr. President, this bill does nothing to get at the causes of strikes. A strike is a symptom of an industrial malady. An industry like coal mining, which suffers eight major strikes in 5 years, is a sick industry, whatever one may think of the miners' union or its leader. Men who are satisfied, receiving fair wages, working under tolerable conditions, and living in decent houses cannot be driven off the job. Men who are frustrated, underpaid, worried about their families and their futures will strike under good union leadership, bad union leadership, or no union leadership. I know there is a prevalent illusion that union leaders cause strikes, though the votes under the Smith-Connally Act demonstrated once and for all that the vast majority of strikes are overwhelmingly supported by workers, the fantasy persists that they can be prevented by taking action against union leaders. What this Congress should study is the rank-and-file workers, not the superficialities of the labor scene. Mr. Henry Ford II was recently amazed to find that a poll among his workers showed a vast majority dissatisfied with their jobs despite the improvement in working conditions brought about by trade unionism. Now, Mr. Ford is prepared to go to work to find out why the men are dissatisfied and to do something about it—an intelligent course of action which could be commended to this Congress.

Mr. President, what do Senators really know of the conditions of life of the coal miners? Why do the miners follow John Lewis so solidly? The answer does not lie in saying that Mr. Lewis is a bad man. It lies deep in the dangers of the mines, in the squalor of waterless hovels, in an absence of recreation, in a feeling of insincerity in an industry which is chaotic, unstable, and declining. If we study those problems, we may find some answers. We shall not find them in an eternal denunciation of trade-union leaders.

The causes of industrial strife during the past year and a half are clear. The Bureau of Labor Statistics reveals that 85 percent of the time lost through strikes in 1946 was due to inadequate wages. Reconversion, rising prices, the dislocations of the war, and the repeal of price controls piled upon workers burdens which they could not carry. The proponents of this bill, so concerned about this loss of working time, are utterly heedless of the millions of man-days of lost work that will result from the unemployment which this bill must engender.

Mr. President, I could continue at some length to emphasize the punitive provisions of this bill; but I realize it would serve no purpose except to make a record here of the shabby business we have been transacting in this body for the future study and consideration of the people. I am sure, however, that what has already been said by me and will be said by others here is a sufficient indictment of this reactionary-led, labor-hating Eightieth Congress of the United States. I will therefore now undertake to draw my remarks to a close.

CONCLUSION

It is with real disappointment and forebodings of the future that I survey the work of this Congress on labor problems. It was announced at the outset that we were to be fair. How fair is this bill? To begin with, it has given workers and trade-unions no new right or privilege; to the contrary it has removed most of those which they enjoyed. It has taken from employers no right which they had; to the contrary it has strengthened their hand at every step in the industrial process, from the time a group of workers first contemplate organization through every subsequent effort to improve their conditions. It limits the access of the unions to governmental machinery by trade-unions in manifold ways. No limitation whatsoever is placed on employer access to the chances which this bill gives them to cripple unions. We must concede the fact; this bill is only in the interest of employers, and fairness played no part in its drafting or passage.

It was announced that we were to equalize the law. How far does this bill achieve that purpose? Most of those provisions directed to trade-unions go to their very right to do business at all; unless they comply with all these new requirements they may not even conduct their affairs. There is nowhere in the bill a single line which goes to the employer's right to do business. The bill could have attained equality only by saying that employers who failed to live up to the requirements of Federal legislation should cease to do business; something, of course, not contemplated by anyone.

Not all businessmen welcome this legislation; considerable numbers of them look with apprehension to what it may mean in the future. One, among many evidences of that growing point of view, is found in a recent article by C. F. Hughes, economist of the New York Times, in which he stated:

> Some of the national legislation that many industrialists thought would solve most of their problems is now close at hand. The labor bills are in conference. The portal-pay bill was signed last week. The juggernaut of economy is riding roughshod over essential services of the Government.
> Despite the signs that normalcy is back in the saddle, there is a strange lack of enthusiasm among businessmen for the achievements that they called for and sponsored. The plain fact seems to be that they are weighing the legislative program in the balance of what help it is likely to yield in staving off or moderating the recession which some trade experts admit has already started.
> On this important score the business verdict veers to the theory that the legislation doesn't weigh much and may, in fact, weigh the wrong way on the scales.
> Outside of the die-hards in industry, there is small relish on the part of management for another round of labor bickering and confusion as business affairs in general move into the critical recession stage. There will be enough to attend to on the competitive front, it is pointed out, without having to struggle with basic changes in the labor set-up.

The same writer, in another issue of the New York Times, said:

> To the eyes of some business observers last week the situation began to look like a combination of 1920 and 1937. President Truman repeated his indictment of high prices and later made it clear that he would stop at "moral suasion." This seemed to bring in the 1937 element.
> It will be recalled that when prices were on the rise in that year there was some moral suasion from the White House also. Moreover, General Johnson's NRA had persuaded industry that here was a perfect scheme of life. As long as the labor provision of the NRA Act was accepted, producers could get together pretty well on prices and there would be no "chiseling."
> This assurance of price protection was equivalent to the assurance that has prevailed since VJ-day that huge, unfilled markets and tremendous war savings would take care of any industrial and trade emergency. But in 1937 stocks accumulated under the NRA dispensation and finally there was the collapse, and demand diminished. Production did a nose-dive. Prices sagged but not as drastically as in 1920.
> How the combination of 1920 and 1937 will make out is anyone's guess in the opinion of the observers who make the comparison thus outlined. They are quite sure, however, that the stakes involved are far greater than in either of the previous years by reason of the fact that the free enterprise system here is engaged in a final struggle against the rival systems of totalitarianism and socialism. The stalling tactics of Russia at the Moscow Conference which has ended without results are attributed with good reason to a Soviet desire to await what happens here.
> What our critics see at present is that business which got into the "doghouse" in 1932 and then retrieved itself so nicely by its war record, is now in imminent danger of being banished again. Business itself can raise the cry against labor and the farmers and the Government but it still cannot erase those profit statements.
> Last week, however, the labor-management agreements came through which for a time appeared doubtful. The steel settlement was followed by the automobile pact which will set the pattern for the industry. Thus labor peace seems assured in the basic industries in spite of pending legislation in Congress that stirs up furious union resentment.

Mr. President, we have heard ad nauseam the claim of union monopoly. Let us think of our own communities. In our communities are the mechanics in the shops, the truck drivers, the carpenters, the steel workers, monopolists? Let us take off the false lenses which the sponsors of this legislation have placed before our eyes, and what do we see? Normal American citizens, the mass of our people, having a rough time getting along because prices are going up faster than wages. If we look on the other side of town, what do we see? The wealthy, getting higher dividends and profits and salaries than they have ever known in our history, preening themselves that when this bill passes they are going to get even with labor. What does that mean? What it has always meant; that these same individuals cannot tolerate any force—whether governmental, labor, or otherwise—to restrain in the slightest degree their desire for wealth. The twentieth century still has its Bourbons as did the eighteenth, and its Tories as did the nineteenth. Look candidly and honestly and tell me where in the labor-union movement monopoly can be seen.

A recent cartoon flatteringly showed me trying to prevent the pendulum from swinging back. In a sense it was accurate, for I deeply feel that the reaction of the Congress is begetting counteraction among the people which, instead of leaving us a united people, heedless of class distinctions, will make us a nation of divided and warring camps. That has been the course of other countries; it has begotten only war, dictatorship, poverty, and a demoralization of everything that constitutes civilized life. And the only alternative is self-restraint on all sides; the real medium for attaining it is genuine collective bargaining between strong unions and healthy business. This is the real middle-of-the-road course for which I stand. It outlaws even the thought of pendulums or a contest for position between management and labor. It says, as Chief Justice Taft said years ago, that "unions arose out of the necessities of the situation." It welcomes them as a check on unlimited industrial power and a vehicle for the attainment of a genuine democratic participation by workers in those matters which most vitally concern them—their jobs and their pay.

I take pride in the little that we have been able to do to stem this tide. Happily, there is in this great land of ours a solid tradition of real fairness; not that kind of fairness which seeks to apply the Marquis of Queensbury rules when a thug is beating up a defenseless passer-by, but a genuine concern that all shall share in the wealth which we have all created. Caught unawares, deluded by the most expensive propaganda campaign which has ever attended a legislative battle, their voice is for the moment still and small. But it is being aroused; it will be constantly goaded by the evident unfairness which will attend this legislation, if enacted. Its voice has been heard before, loud and clear, and already its distant rumble sounds through the din so artificially created by the forces behind this bill.

Let me, in conclusion, read from the social reconstruction program of the National Catholic War Council, which appeared as long ago as 1919, and which remains true today:

> The capitalist must likewise get a new viewpoint. He needs to learn the long-forgotten truth that wealth is stewardship, that profit-making is not the basic justification of business enterprise, and that there are such things as fair profits, fair interest, and fair prices. Above and before all, he must cultivate and strengthen within his mind the truth which many of his class have begun to grasp for the first time during the present war, namely, that the laborer is a human being, not merely an instrument of production, and that the laborer's right to a decent livelihood is the first moral charge upon industry. The employer has a right to get a reasonable livelihood out of his business, but he has no right to interest on his investment until his employees have obtained at least living wages. This is the human and Christian, in contrast to the purely commercial and pagan ethics of industry.

That the Eightieth Congress may not go down in infamy among our people, I beg of the Senate to take the decent, the Christian, the human, the honest course, and reject this measure.

Mr. MURRAY subsequently said: Mr. President, at the time I addressed the Senate earlier in the day, I had intended to offer for the RECORD an analysis of title I of H. R. 3020. I now ask that the analysis may be printed in connection with my remarks, at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANALYSIS OF TITLE I OF H. R. 3020, TAFT-HARTLEY BILL

SHORT TITLE AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

Section 1 of the bill sets forth a new declaration of policy. This provision was inserted by the conference committee. The section declares that industrial strife can be avoided if employers, employees, and unions recognize one another's legitimate rights and that neither party has any right to engage in acts or practices which jeopardize the public health, safety, or interest.

The purpose of the bill is declared to be to define the legitimate rights of employees and employers, to provide peaceful procedures to prevent interference with these rights, to protect the rights of individual employees in their relations with unions, to define and prescribe labor and management practices which are inimical to the general welfare, and to protect the rights of the public in connection with labor disputes.

Title I. Amendments of National Labor Relations Act

Section 101 of the bill rewrites the National Labor Relations Act.

Section 1 amends the findings and policies contained in section 1 of the National Labor Relations Act by:

1. Stating that the denial by some employers of the right of employees to organize and the refusal of some employers to accept the procedure of collective bargaining leads to strikes, etc. The act does not now contain the word "some."

2. Adding a new paragraph which say in effect that certain practices of some labor organizations, their officers, and members also obstruct commerce by leading to strikes and unrest.

Section 2 amends section 2 of the National Labor Relations Act in the following respects:

1. Person: The meaning of the term has been enlarged to include specifically labor organizations in addition to partnerships, associations, corporations, legal representatives, trustees, trustees in bankruptcy, or receivers, now encompassed in the National Labor Relations Act.

2. Employer: The bill amends section 2 (2) of the National Labor Relations Act to exclude from the coverage of the act wholly-owned Government corporations, Federal Reserve banks, and any corporation or association operating a hospital, if no part of the net earnings inures to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual.

The bill also changes the definition of employer (which now includes any person acting as an agent of an employer directly or indirectly) to read "any person acting as an agent of an employer directly or indirectly." This amendment was inserted in the Senate bill by the conference committee.

The apparent intention of this redefinition is to change the rule, adopted by the Supreme Court in International Association of Machinists v. N. L. R. B. (311 U. S. 72), that an employer is responsible for the actions of his supervisory employees, even though he might not be under the strict common-law rules of agency. This change may make necessary proof that an employer had specifically authorized his supervisory employees to engage in unfair labor practices—matters which are easily concealed. In modern industrial enterprises supervisory employees, such as foremen and superintendents, are management to the workers under them and employers should be held responsible for their actions.

In gaging the approach governing the amendments to the Wagner Act proposed in this bill it is significant to note that the proposed restriction of management responsibility for the acts of supervisory employees is inconsistent with the principle underlying the exclusion in section 2 (3) of supervisory employees from the provisions of the bill. This exclusion is based on the premise that supervisory employees are a part of management and that this relationship is incompatible with the protection by the act of their efforts to organize. Thus, on the one hand, supervisors are too close to management to warrant their protection by the act and, on the other hand, not close enough to make management responsible for their acts except on the basis of the strict common-law rules of agency.

The imposition of the strict common-law rule of agency may also affect the Board's power to proceed against so-called citizen committees and vigilante groups which in the past have often aided and abetted employers in their antiunion campaigns. Under the present act, the Board has the necessary power to proceed against such parties as persons "acting in the interest of an employer directly or indirectly." This power obviously should be preserved. The proposed redefinition of the term "employer" may render the Board helpless to deal with such groups.

3. Employees: This definition follows that contained in the Wagner Act except that the following categories are specifically excluded: Supervisors, independent contractors, individuals employed by an employer subject to the Railway Labor Act, and any individual employed "by any other person who is not an employer" as defined in the bill. The term supervisor is defined in section 2 (11) of the bill.

Comment: Section 14 (a) of the bill recognizes a supervisor's right to join and remain a member of a labor organization. This right is meaningless without the legal sanctions necessary to give vitality and substance to it. Under this bill the Board would be powerless either to hold an election to determine the supervisor's choice of bargaining representatives, if any, or to protect them against dismissal because they have exercised their natural right to join a labor organization.

As the Secretary of Labor has pointed out, supervisory employees should not be allowed to be in the same union as rank-and-file employees, but they should have the right to form unions not affiliated with or controlled by unions of production workers and this right should be protected by the NLRA. Within the limits of these views, supervisory employees should have the same right to be protected in their efforts to organize in the interest of their own wages and hours and working conditions as other employees. Their loyalties to their employer in the effective accomplishment of their duties are no more inconsistent with their interest in the conditions of their employment than is true in the case of any other employees.

The bill ignores the fact that unionization of foremen is an accomplished fact in many industries, and that removal of the act's protection from foremen does not destroy their right to join labor organizations. Instead, the result, as their history under the act has shown, is to force these employees to resort to self-help and illegal strikes, for they will have no recourse to the act's processes.

4. Professional employee: The bill amends the Wagner Act by the addition of a definition of the term "professional employee." The significance of this definition is that the bill provides in section 9 for separate voting of such employees in Board elections.

5. Agent: Section 2 (13) of the bill amends the Wagner Act to provide that in determining the agency "the question of whether the specific acts performed were actually authorized or subsequently ratified shall not be controlling." This provision was added by the conference committee.

Section 3 (a): This section amends the act by increasing the number of members on the Board from 3 to 5.

Section 3 (b): This subsection authorizes the Board to sit in panels of three or more members, any panel of which may possess any or all of the powers which the Board itself may exercise.

Comments: The real need sought to be met by the amendment increasing the Board membership to 5 is the handling of a large volume of cases and a consequent backlog of over 5,000 cases. This problem can best be solved by providing adequate appropriations to permit employment of a staff adequate to meet the situation rather than by enlarging the Board to an extent which may make it unwieldy and which may interfere with efficient administration.

Section 3 (d): This section amends the NLRA to provide for the appointment of the Board's general counsel by and with the advice and consent of the Senate for a term of 4 years. The general counsel is to exercise supervision over all attorneys, other than trial examiners and legal assistants to the Board members, and over the officers and employees in the regional offices. He is to have final authority, on behalf of the Board, in the investigation and prosecution of all unfair labor practice cases.

Comment: This provision was inserted by the conference committee. The effect of the proposed change in the status of the Board's general counsel is to place enormous power in the hands of a single individual, making him virtually a "labor czar." This power would include the right to decide what unfair labor practice cases shall come before the Board and the courts for decision. Through this power, the general counsel, to a considerable degree, would be able to control the policy for the enforcement of the act.

Aside from the serious objection that the proposed change places too much power in the hands of a single individual, there is the further objection that differences of views as to policy between the Board and its General Counsel may reach a point where effective enforcement of the act would be impeded. Control over all phases of the administration of the act now possessed by the Boards permits a coordination that makes for effective enforcement. At the same time the internal separation of the judicial from the prosecuting function which now exists in the Board and which is required by the Administrative Procedure Act assures that impartiality of judgment so necessary to the proper performance of the Board's functions. Thus, on the one hand, there is no good reason which warrants the proposed change. On the other hand, the amendment possesses all the disadvantages of the proposal that there be a complete separation of functions previously rejected by the Senate.

The concentration of power which would result from the enactment of this provision is all the more serious in view of the many new functions contemplated in the bill. To place this increased responsibility upon a single individual is clearly unwise from the point of view of the public interest involved.

Section 4 would amend section 4 of the NLRA in the following respects:

Section 4 (a) (review section): The bill would amend section 4 (a) of the N. L. R. A. to prohibit the Board from employing attorneys for the purpose of reviewing transcripts of hearings and preparing drafts of opinions "except that any attorney employed for assignment as a legal assistant to any Board member may for such Board member review such transcripts and prepare such drafts."

Comment: The effect of this amendment is to abolish the Review Section, which now operates as a pool of attorneys to assist the Board in reviewing transcripts and drafting opinions. The proposal is based upon the erroneous assumption that there is existing abuse in the present structure. The facts do not warrant this assumption.

Moreover, the proposal would not obviate the need for attorneys to perform the duties now performed by the Review Section. It would actually require the establishment of five small review sections, with consequent duplication of work at a great expenditure of time and of money. Instead of a single Board there would be five "little boards" operating as autonomous units. The change proposed is contrary to the practice employed in other administrative agencies and permitted by the Administrative Procedure Act.

Section 4 (a) (trial examiners and economic analysis): The bill would further amend section 4 (a) to prohibit any consultation between the Board and a trial examiner with respect to his findings and to prohibit the review of a trial examiner's report either before or after its publication by any person other than a Board member or his legal assistant.

Finally, the bill amends section 4 (a) to prohibit the Board from appointing individuals for the purpose of economic analysis.

Comment: The Board since 1940, at which time it abolished its Division of Economic Research, has not employed individuals to engage in general economic research. The Board at the present time employs a limited number of industrial analysts who are occupied chiefly with the analysis of employment records and pay rolls, the computation of back pay and deductible net earnings, and the performance of other similar work.

Under this bill, however, the need for persons to do economic analysis will be increased rather than diminished, particularly with respect to the new functions of determining such difficult matters as jurisdictional disputes, feather bedding practices, boycotts, and the excessiveness of union fees. Much background material will be needed to fix appropriate policies. The assembling and study of this material can best be performed by economists. The restriction imposed by section 4 (a) can thus only impair the Board's ability to discharge the new duties imposed by the bill.

Section 7: The bill was modified by the conference committee to amend section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act by adding to the present guaranty of the right of employees to engage in concerted activities the right "to refrain from any and all such activity except to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment as authorized in section 8 (a) (3)."

Comment: The right of employees to refrain from concerted activity is, of course, implicit in the present act. The addition of this provision is thus entirely unnecessary and can only lead to a serious increase in litigation and controversy. Indeed, when considered in connection with section 8 (b), particularly section 8 (b) (1), the proposal can only serve to deprive workers of their right to join together for collective bargaining purposes under the guise of protecting their right to refrain from so doing. The effect of these provisions when viewed together is to discourage rather than encourage collective bargaining.

Section 8 amends section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act in a number of important respects.

Employer Unfair Labor Practices

Section 8 (a) (3). The bill in section 8 (a) (3) amends section 8 (3) of the Wagner Act to outlaw all closed-shop agreements and to permit union-shop agreements under the following conditions:

(1) If the labor organization is a majority representative; and

(2) If the Board certifies, after a vote, that at least a majority of the employees eligible to vote have voted to authorize the union to make such an agreement.

The bill further provides that an employer may not justify discrimination against an employee for nonmembership in a union—

(1) if the employer has reason to believe that membership was not available to him on the same terms and conditions generally applicable to other members; or

(2) if he has reason to believe that the employee lost his membership for reasons other than the failure to tender periodic dues or initiation fees.

Comment: The provisions of section 8 (a) (3) should be read together with section 8 (b) (2) and section 9 (e). Section 8 (b) (2) makes it an unfair labor practice for a union to cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an employee who has been denied or deprived of union membership on grounds other than failure to pay periodic dues and initiation fees. Section 9 (e) provides for elections to authorize the execution of union-security provisions upon petition of 30 percent or more of the employees in the unit. Section 9 (e) further provides for elections to rescind such authority. Taken together, the provisions would have undesirable consequences as follows:

1. As of April 1946, 30 percent of the workers covered by collective-bargaining contracts were covered by contracts which included closed-shop agreements. These agreements would be outlawed by the provisions of section 8 (a) (3). Moreover, the requirement that those union-security agreements permitted by the section must be authorized by a majority of the employees eligible to vote rather than a majority of the employees voting is contrary to existing procedures in political and corporate elections and creates an obstacle which can only serve to reduce drastically the number of such agreements. The impact of this provision would be considerable in view of the fact that approximately 44 percent of the workers covered by collective-bargaining agreements are covered by agreements which contain union security provisions other than closed shop.

2. The amendments would throw upon the Board a serious administrative burden. There are some twenty to thirty thousand collective-bargaining agreements containing union security provisions now in effect. The Board now has a tremendous backlog of unfair-labor-practice and representation cases. It would, under this bill, be required to take on the additional function of conducting elections to determine the union's authority to enter into such agreements or to determine whether authority previously given was rescinded.

3. Employees could with impunity completely defy the union even under union-security contracts permitted under the bill. He could engage in any type of activity inimical to the interests of the union, such as engaging in wildcat strikes, strikebreaking, and racketeering and yet not be subject to its discipline so long as he pays his dues. The bill has gone far beyond its objective, if its aim is to outlaw the closed shop.

4. The amendment makes the employer the judge of the justifiability of firing or retaining a nonunion employee under a union-shop agreement. It does not require that employees actually lose membership in a union but only that the employer has reasonable grounds for so believing. This belief might be contrary to the facts so that the Board would find it necessary to determine not a state of facts but a state of mind.

Union Unfair Labor Practices

The bill further amends section 8 of the Wagner Act by the addition of a new subsection (b) declaring the following conduct on the part of a labor organization or its agents to be unfair labor practices:

1. To restrain or coerce (A) employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7; provided, that this provision shall not impair the right of a labor organization to prescribe its own rules with respect to the acquisition or retention of membership. (B) an employee in the selection of his representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances.

2. To cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an employee in violation of section 8 (a) (3) or to discriminate against an employee whose membership in the union has been denied or terminated on some ground other than his failure to pay periodic dues or initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership.

3. To refuse to bargain collectively with an employer.

4. To engage in or encourage the employees of any employer to engage in a strike or refusal to handle if an object thereof is a secondary boycott, jurisdictional strike, strike against a Board certification or an effort to require any employer or self-employed person to join any labor organization or employer organization.

5. To require of employees covered by a union-shop agreement the payment of fees in an amount which "the Board finds excessive or discriminatory under all the circumstances." In making this finding the Board is to consider, among other things, the practices and customs of labor organizations in the particular industry, and the wages currently paid to the employees affected.

6. To force or require an employer to pay or agree to pay any money "in the nature of an exaction" for services which are not performed or not to be performed.

Comment: The proposal contained in section 8 (b) (1) making it an unfair labor practice on the part of the unions and their agents "to restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in section 7" would lead to protracted litigation, because of the difficulty in determining who are agents of a labor organization and what constitutes restraint and coercion within its meaning. Moreover, assuming that these prescribed acts involve violence and physical coercion, the provision is unnecessary because offenses of this type are punishable under State and local police laws. In fact, the enactment of this provision would make unions and their agents liable twice for the same offense, once under State and once under Federal law. Employers run no such double risk for interfering with their employees' rights. There is a lack of compelling evidence that State law enforcement has broken down to the extent which warrants the Federal Government intruding into a field more properly the sphere of State and local enforcement officials. Furthermore, the amendment is impractical because an effective remedy against such offenses is quick arrest, criminal trial, and conviction—not an administrative hearing followed months or years later by a cease and desist order. Finally, the Board would have to increase its staff tremendously to investigate the many charges of this character which would be filed. It would have to concern itself with issues with which it should not be concerned. For example, the Board in determining whether mass picketing was being engaged in would have to determine the number of pickets who may be used on the picket line.

The effect of the amendment proposed in section 8 (b) (2) is discussed in connection with section (8) (a) (3), supra.

The amendment proposed in section 8 (b) (4) would not be objectionable if the prohibited activities were more precisely defined and were limited to those which are generally recognized as clearly unjustified, such as jurisdictional strikes and boycotts, and strikes against Board certification. The principal objection to section 8 (b) (4) is that the language of certain of its provisions is so broad as to represent an indiscriminate attack on forms of peaceful action by labor unions without regard to whether the objective of the action is the promoting of legitimate interests in wages, hours, and working conditions or the furtherance of such illegitimate objectives as jurisdictional disputes. Thus, for example, under the provisions of paragraph (A) all secondary boycotts would be prohibited including those which may be directed against sweatshop conditions or other conditions and which are necessary to protect the interests of the workers. The section would also outlaw all sympathy strikes. While such strikes should not be encouraged, they frequently are necessary to the achievement of legitimate union demands and when properly used should be a protected activity.

In addition, the changes made by the conference committee in paragraph (D) would make it possible for an employer in the allocation of work tasks to favor the members of a nonunionized craft at the expense of a craft which has been unionized. The provision as it originally appeared in the Senate bill prohibited strikes or boycotts for the purpose of requiring an employer to assign to members of a particular union work tasks assigned by the employer to members of some other union. The Senate bill thus limited this prohibition to controversies between two or more labor organizations over the right to perform particular work tasks. The provision as amended by the conference committee, however, prohibits strikes or boycotts to require an employer to assign particular work to employees in a particular union or in a particular trade, craft, or class rather than to employees in another union or in another trade, craft, or class. The effect of this change is to proscribe the use of strikes or boycotts where an employer attempts to undermine a craft union by discriminatory assignments of work tasks to unorganized employees in another trade, craft, or class. The conference committee version thus goes far beyond the original objective of preventing jurisdictional strikes and boycotts and creates a statutory technique for undermining craft unions.

Furthermore, the changes made by the conference committee in paragraph (A) forbidding strikes or boycotts to require a "self-employed person" to join any labor organization may give rise to the use by employers of so-called self-employed persons to undermine the wage and hour standards of employees. This paragraph would prevent the regular employees from taking effective action in such situations even though their wage and hour standards were directly and intimately involved.

Finally it should be noted that the conference committee has substituted the language "where an object thereof" for the language "for the purpose thereof" as the test to be used in determining the legality of certain concerted activity by labor unions. The effect of this amendment is to outlaw as an unfair labor practice any strike or refusal to handle which has as any of its objectives a practice prohibited in section 8 (b) (4). This amendment adopts a view even more restrictive than that followed by the courts in the days when the concerted activities of labor unions were subjected to prosecution under antitrust and conspiracy laws. Even under these decisions the test adopted by the court in determining whether union activity was unlawful was that of primary objective.

The provisions of section 8 (b) (5) were added by the conference committee. This section would require the Board to determine whether union fees were excessive or discriminatory. The danger in this provision arises from the fact that in making the required determination, the Board may in effect be required to regulate many of the internal union affairs. For example, in determining whether a particular fee was excessive the Board may have to decide whether union officers were making excessive expenditures, whether the union was organized and run economically, and whether expenditures authorized by the union such as donations to charity were proper. Obviously, the Board should not be required to decide such matters. Despite the existence of abuses in a few instances, it would appear that the amount of union fees can best be determined by the unions themselves.

The provisions of section 8 (b) (6) are directed against so-called feather-bedding practices. This section was also added by the conference committee. This provision like so many other provisions of the bill, although directed toward a desirable objective, could easily be used to interfere with legitimate union activities. In evaluating the possible impact of this section it must be borne in mind that many of the practices now viewed as feather-bedding practices had their origin in the health and safety requirements of workers. The determination, therefore, of whether a particular demand by a union for the employment of additional help is in effect featherbedding or a legitimate demand would in many cases require a detailed knowledge of the requirements of the particular company involved. The difficulty of accumulating this type of information and the type of experience necessary to make a just determination of the issue is obvious.

The chief danger in the provision is that it may restrict labor organizations in their attempts to combat speed-ups, to protect the safety and health of the workers, and to spread the burden of unemployment. These considerations suggest that the solution of this problem could better be left to the collective bargaining process.

Section 8 (c): The bill further amends section 8 of the Wagner Act by the addition of section 8 (c). This section provides that "expression of any views, argument, or opinion, or the dissemination thereof, whether in written, printed, graphic, or visual form, shall not constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice * * * if such expression contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit." This provision for some reason does not expressly include oral expressions of views. This omission in view of the express reference to written statements would appear to be inadvertent.

Comment: This provision was substituted by the conference committee for the Senate provision prohibiting the Board from finding any noncoercive statement to be an unfair labor practice. It thus goes far beyond the Senate provision and far beyond the mere protection of an admitted constitutional right. By saying that statements are not to be considered as evidence, the bill requires the Board and the courts to close their eyes to the plain implications of speech and disregard clear and probative evidence. In no other field of law are a man's statements thus excluded as evidence of an illegal intention. The sweeping character of the prohibition is such that, if enacted into law, it will seriously circumscribe the Board in the prevention of the unfair practices proscribed by the bill. In this connection it should be noted that this limitation would apply not only to employer violations of the act but also to union unfair labor practices as well.

Section 8 (d): Collective bargaining is defined to mean the performances of the mutual obligation of parties to meet and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, or the negotiation of an agreement, or the settlement of any question arising thereunder, and the execution of a written agreement incorporating any agreement reached, but no obligation exists to agree to a proposal or make a concession providing that where there is an agreement a party may not terminate or modify such agreement unless there is first given:

(1) Sixty days' written notice of such proposed change;

(2) Offers to meet and confer for the purpose of negotiating a new or modified contract;

(3) Notifies the Service (Conciliation) within 30 days after such notice if no agreement has been reached; and

(4) Continues the terms and conditions of the agreement without strike or lock-out for 60 days after such notice is given. Employees who engage in a strike during the 60-day cooling-off period lose their status as employees under the Wagner Act.

This section also provides that the provisions of paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) shall become inapplicable if the contracting union is superseded by another union certified by the Board as a bargaining representative and that the duties imposed by section 8 (d) are not to be construed as requiring the parties to a collective agreement to discuss or agree to any modification of its provisions to be effective during its term.

Comment: Under the provisions of section 8 both unions and employers are required to bargain collectively. A violation of this requirement is made an unfair labor practice, subject to a cease-and-desist order from the Board. A strike or lock-out during the 60-day period specified in section 8 (d) defining collective bargaining would thus constitute an unfair labor practice. There is no reasonable ground for discriminating against employees by providing an additional penalty which will cause them to lose their status as employees under the NLRA. An order to the employer to cease and desist issued months after the violation cannot compare in severity with the loss to the employee of his job.

Moreover, the section is silent as to the Board's authority to consider such factors as provocation on the part of the employer. Under this section an employer who desires to rid himself either of the employees or their representatives can engage in the most provocative conduct without fear of redress except by way of a lengthy hearing before the Board. In contrast to this relatively delicate treatment provided for such action by an employer, employees unwilling idly to countenance abuse, who resort to self-help under the circumstances, lose their employee status under the act and are subject to summary dismissal.

A further objection to section 8 (d) arises from the provision stating that the section shall not be construed to require parties to discuss and agree to any modification of a collective agreement during its term. This provision would nullify the salutary rule established by the board that the obligation to bargain continues despite the execution of a collective agreement. This rule does not mean that the parties must reach any agreement. It merely requires that there be negotiation in good faith. This principle obviously is one in the interest of industrial peace. The seriousness of the change proposed becomes apparent in view of the difficulty of determining what is an amendment to a contract or merely an interpretation of its terms. Employers desirous of avoiding collective bargaining can do so merely by asserting that the matter which the union desires to negotiate is in effect a modification of the collective agreement. Employees thus are left to resort to strikes in order to bring about the adjustments they desire.

Representation Cases

Section 9 makes a number of important changes in the Wagner Act.

Section 9 (a) amends the act to permit individual employees or groups of employees the right to present and adjust grievances without intervention of the bargaining representative provided the adjustment is not inconsistent with the collective agreement and provided further that the bargaining representative has been given the opportunity to be present at such adjustment.

Comment: This proposal merely requires that the bargaining representative be given an opportunity to be present at the adjustment of a grievance. It does not require that the bargaining representative be given an opportunity to be present during the preliminary discussion or to participate in the adjustment. This provision thus makes available to employers a means of undermining the status of the duly chosen bargaining representative by dealing directly with individual employees in the settlement of their grievances and by giving favored treatment to nonunion employees.

Section 9 (b) prohibits the Board from including professional employees in units with other employees unless they first vote in favor of such inclusion. In addition, in determining whether members of a craft may be separated from a larger unit, the Board may not dismiss a craft petition on the ground that a different unit has been established by a prior determination. Finally, the Board may not include guards in the same unit with other employees and may not certify any labor organization as the bargaining representative of guards if it admits to membership employees other than guards. This last provision was added by the conference committee after the Supreme Court's decision in the Atkins case.

Comment: The restriction on Board discretion with respect to professional employees and guards would require the Board wholly to ignore existing and satisfactory bargaining patterns and units. It would disrupt existing bargaining units and weaken the bargaining power of professionals and guards.

The craft unit limitation would tend to fragmentize unions based upon membership broader than a single craft. This is particularly serious when applied to the large enterprises covered by the national act. It would disturb existing bargaining patterns and would encourage raiding by rival organizations. It would thus result in industrial unrest. Moreover, it would require employers to deal with many crafts rather than a single industrial union.

Section 9 (c) (1) permits employees to file petitions for elections to certify a collective bargaining representative or to deprive of exclusive representative status one currently recognized by their employer as certified as their representative. Employers are also given the right of petition after the union has actually claimed a majority or demanded exclusive recognition. Section 9 (c) (1) further provides that hearing officers in representation cases may not make any recommendation to the Board.

Comment: The provision of section 9 (c) (1) permitting proceedings to decertify a bargaining representative would furnish employers with a useful device for undermining the position of the bargaining agent and for delaying collective bargaining. By encouraging dissident groups to file petitions, the employer can repeatedly bring into issue the majority status of the bargaining representative.

The most serious objection to the provision permitting employer petitions in single union cases is that in situations where unions are established in a plant and only questions of continuing majority are involved, the Board would not clearly have discretion to dismiss the petition if there was no reasonable basis in fact for the employer to doubt that the labor organization still represents a majority. Employers thus are given a useful device for delay. Moreover, unions would be compelled to engage in election campaigns at the close of each bargaining term and would be tempted to make unreasonable demands in order to retain the allegiance of the employees. Uninterrupted and stable bargaining relations would thus be impaired.

Presumably the purpose of the proposal forbidding hearing officers in representation cases from making recommendation to the Board is to isolate the Board members from the Board agents who conduct the representation investigations required under the act. These investigations are fact-finding, to determine the identity of the representative selected, if any; they are entirely nonadversary; and they result in no order requiring the employer to do or refrain from doing anything. The Administrative Procedure Act of 1946, in recognition of these facts, expressly exempted these proceedings from the separation-of-functions provision of section 5 of the act, as well as from the other careful procedural and decisional safeguards established in that law. The effect of the instant bill is to override the Administrative Procedure Act in this respect without any basis in the record for doing so. Moreover, the Board is denied the assistance which the hearing officers' recommendations provide, although no considerations of fair procedure or due process require it. The only result can be to deprive the Board of the informal judgment of the men who know most about the case.

Section 9 (c) (2): In determining whether to proceed in a representation case the NLRB is to apply the same regulations and rules of decision irrespective of the identity of the persons filing the petition or the kind of relief sought. The Board may not deny a labor organization a place on the ballot by reason of an order with respect to such labor organization or its successor not issued in conformity with Section 10 (c). Section 10 (c) requires the Board, in determining whether a complaint should issue under section 8 (a) (1) or 8 (a) (2) and in deciding such cases, to apply the same regulations and rules of decisions irrespective of whether or not the labor organization affected is affiliated with a national or international labor organization.

Comment: This section would require the Board to place on ballots for election of representatives independent unions which have been found by the Board to be company-dominated and which have been ordered by it to be disestablished. It would have to do so in an election ordered the day after such an order issued and regardless of the fact that its order had not been complied with. The proviso to section 10 (c) would prohibit the Board from issuing an order to withhold or deny recognition to a company-dominated union unless it would issue the same order with respect to an affiliated union.

These proposals, on the basis of purported equal treatment of affiliated or nonaffiliated unions, ignore the difference in facts and circumstances which warrants the difference in remedy prescribed by the Board. They overlook the fact that the very existence of a labor organization under the dominance of an employer provides the employer with a device by which his power may be made effective. The employer is thus able, with little further action on his part, to obstruct his employees' right to self-organization. The employees, even though they would not initially have chosen the company-dominated union if they had been free of employer domination, may, unless the disestablishment of such a union is required, "by force of a timorous habit, be held firmly to * * * (their) choice."

Unions affiliated with national labor organizations stand in a different posture. Because of their affiliation they draw strength and direction from sources outside the employer's control. Assistance by an employer to a local union thus cannot extend to the point of constituting domination. It is sufficient in such cases merely to require the withdrawal of recognition by the employer from the assisted affiliated union.

These proposals would tend to revive the company-dominated union in American industry and by placing the employer on both sides of the bargaining table develop spurious collective bargaining.

Section 9 (c) (3) prohibits the Board from holding elections more often than once a year in any given bargaining unit unless the results of the first election are inconclusive by reason of none of the competing unions having received a majority.

Comment: While the Board has only infrequently directed elections more than once among the same unit of employees in any one year, there have been circumstances which require exceptions to this general principle. Thus, significant changes in operations involving the employment of different occupational groups may require a redetermination of bargaining representation. Similarly, a substantial expansion or diminution of the working force or a new showing of strength by the union might require special treatment. This matter should, therefore, be left to the discretion of the Board.

Section 9 (c) (3) also provides that strikers not entitled to reinstatement shall not be eligible to vote in a Board election.

Comment: This provision is subject to the construction that it would prevent employees who go out on strike because of a dispute over such matters as wages, hours, or working conditions from voting in a Board election held during the strike. The proposal would enable an employer to secure the rejection of an established bargaining agent at the very time that the public interest makes it particularly urgent that collective-bargaining continue. The employer can, in some cases, achieve this result merely by filing a petition for an election as soon as his employees go out on strike. In such an election the strikers who normally would constitute the bulk of the union's adherents could not vote. The defeat of the bargaining agent is thus assured. Antiunion employers are thus encouraged to refuse settlements of disputes in order to bring about strikes and thereby secure the defeat of the collective-bargaining representative.

Sections 9 (c) (4): Nothing in the section is to be construed to prohibit the waiving of hearings by stipulation for the purpose of consent elections.

Comment: The effect of the provision of section 9 (c) (4) read together with provisions of section 9 (c) (1) would be to prohibit the Board from determining an issue concerning representation by means of a consent card check. This procedure is utilized only where the parties consent and consists of a check of the union's membership cards against the names appearing on the employer's pay roll. Consent card checks make possible a quick determination of the question of whether the employees desire a bargaining representative; they obviate the necessity for a formal proceeding in cases in which there are no issues of fact, thus allowing the Board more time to devote to litigated matters, and they have resulted in a substantial saving in both personnel and money. The type of procedure has been utilized by the Board in over 20 percent of the adjusted representation cases.

Section 9 (c) (4) and 9 (c) (1) would also bar the Board's prehearing election procedure. This prohibition resulted from a change made by the conference committee in the Senate bill. The prehearing election procedure has been useful in making possible quick elections in cases involving no real issues. In many cases the holding of the election has obviated the necessity for further formal proceedings, thus saving a substantial expenditure of money and time. In all cases the parties are entitled to hearing if they so desire. There was no evidence before either the Senate or House Labor Committees justifying the prohibition of this type of procedure.

Section 9 (c) (5): This section was added by the conference committee. It forbids the Board from being controlled, in determining the appropriate unit, by the extent to which employees have organized.

Comment: The effect of this provision is to preclude the establishment of collective bargaining in many industries, notably insurance and similar far-flung enterprises. In such industries organization can proceed only piecemeal and to deny collective bargaining in those areas in which organization has been achieved is to deny it entirely.

Section 9 (e) (1): Provides for proceedings to authorize a bargaining agent to enter into a union-security agreement. Authorization is obtained through an election to be conducted by the Board.

Section 9 (e) (2): Provides for elections for revoking an authorization to enter into a union-security agreement.

Section 9 (e) (3): Provides that no election on the issue of a union authority to enter into a union-security agreement may be conducted more frequently than once in a period of 12 months.

Comment: It is estimated that there are between 20,000 and 30,000 collective-bargaining agreements containing union-security agreements in effect at the present time. Under the above proposals the Board would be required to conduct elections to determine whether the union is authorized to enter into a union-security agreement and also in order to determine whether such authorization once given has been revoked. This additional function given the Board obviously imposes a serious administrative burden on that Board; the proper discharge of which would require substantial additions in personnel and appropriations.

This objection could partially be met by requiring that the vote be conducted only after the employer and the union had reached agreement to include a union security provision in the contract. The advantage of this procedure is that it would prevent the holding of many useless elections merely designed to put pressure on the employer.

Section 9 (f) requires as a prerequisite to the processing of representation cases, union shop elections, or unfair labor practice cases that the labor union, as well as any national or international with which it is affiliated, shall have filed specified information with the Secretary of Labor, including its constitution and bylaws, compensation of officers, manner in which officers are elected or appointed, amount of dues, fees, assets, liabilities, and disbursements, and a detailed statement showing the procedure followed with respect to 12 matters of internal operation of the union. These include procedures followed with respect to (a) qualifications for or restrictions on membership, (b) union elections, (c) calling of meetings, (d) levying of assessments, (e) imposition of fines, (f) authorization for bargaining demands, (g) ratification of contract terms, (h) authorization for strikes, (i) authorization for disbursement of union funds, (j) audit of union financial transactions, (k) participation in insurance or other benefit plans, and (l) expulsion of members and the grounds therefor. The requirement that these details of internal union procedure be specified was added by the conference committee. In addition the union must establish that it has furnished all of its members with copies of its financial report.

Section 9 (g) provides that the information required in section 9 (f) be kept up to date with similar annual reports to the Secretary of Labor, and, so far as financial data is concerned, to members of the union.

Comments: By imposing expensive burdens upon the use of the orderly procedures of the act these provisions would encourage resort to self-help. No valid reason can be shown for conditioning access to Board machinery upon the fulfillment of such registration requirements. Indeed, if the purpose of the provision is to make available information on the organization, operation, and finances of unions it would fall short of achievement because of the fact that a great many unions rarely utilize the machinery of the NLRB and would, therefore, not be required to file the required information.

Nor is there any evidence of a need for the collection of such information in the manner provided for in this provision. Most of it is already made public. A study by the Department of Labor shows that 22 of the 26 internationals in the A. F. of L. provide for regular financial reports to the local unions or to the convention, and for regular publication of financial reports. Of 36 international unions in the CIO, 31 provide for regular financial audits by certified public accountants, 30 publish financial reports available to anyone, and 5 provide for financial reports to local unions or to members.

Consideration must also be given to the expense to the Government imposed by this provision. The Secretary of Labor has warned against setting up a new bureau in the Department of Labor compiling figures and collecting documents the use of which would not justify the expense to the Government.

Finally this provision is open to criticism in that it imposes a burden on labor unions not imposed upon business associations in any similar fashion or to any similar degree.

Section 9 (h): This section prohibits the Board from processing any representation case, union security election, or unfair labor practice case initiated by a labor organization unless an affidavit is filed by each officer of such labor organization and the officers of any national or international of which it is an affiliate, that he is not a member of the Communist Party and "does not believe in and is not a member of or support any organization that believes in or teaches the overthrow of the United States Government by force or by any illegal or unconstitutional methods." The provisions of section 35 A of the Criminal Code are made applicable to such affidavits. This provision was substituted for the provision contained in the Senate bill.

Comment: The effect of this provision is to penalize not only members of the Communist Party but, by denying the union its rights under the Wagner Act, penalize also those persons within the trade union movement who have been most active in seeking to rid trade unions of Communist influence. The provision, by placing all members of the union under the same penalties as its Communist officers, would strengthen rather than weaken Communist trade union infiltration. In this connection it should be noted that the denial of rights under the Wagner Act results not only where an officer of a local union fails to file the necessary affidavit but also where an officer of the international fails to do so.

Section 10 amends section 10 of the National Labor Relations Act in several respects.

Section 10 (a) would amend the National Labor Relations Act to omit present language that the power of the Board to prevent unfair labor practices "shall be exclusive." The phrase omitted was included in the NLRA to make it clear that all unfair labor practices were to be handled solely by the NLRB. It has served a useful purpose in establishing a uniform national labor policy in the field occupied by the Federal Statute. No good reason for omitting this provision has been advanced.

Section 10 (a) permits the National Labor Relations Board to allow State labor relations boards to take jurisdiction in cases in border-line industry except where the applicable provisions of the State statute are inconsistent with the corresponding provisions of the bill or have received a construction inconsistent therewith.

Section 10 (b) sets forth the procedure to be followed in unfair labor practice cases. These provisions are essentially the same as those contained in the present act with two major exceptions. The bill would amend the National Labor Relations Act so as to prevent the Board from issuing any complaint or unfair labor practices unless the practices occurred within 6 months prior to the filing and service of the charge.

The bill would further amend the NLRB by requiring that so far as practicable the United States District Court rules of evidence shall apply in proceedings under the act.

Comment: The effect of the 6-month statute of limitations imposed by section 10 (b) would be particularly harmful in cases involving unfair labor practices of a kind that cannot readily be detected, such as those involving company-dominated unions, surveillance, espionage, and similar misconduct. Such activities normally do not come to light until an outside union attempts to organize a plant. Under the present National Labor Relations Act and the Board's rules, employers are afforded adequate protection against untimely charges for the Board will not proceed against them unless good cause appears for the delay. Moreover, even in those cases in which it proceeds, the Board usually does not require the employer to pay back wages for the period of delay. The proposals would merely encourage employer unfair labor practices of a kind that cannot readily be detected by establishing after the passage of a short space of 6 months an absolute immunity against such malpractices. The bill would deprive employees and the public in many cases of the benefits of genuine collective bargaining and encourage resort to strikes and other means of self-help.

The provision applying the United States District Court rules of evidence to Board proceedings would replace the present rule in the NLRA that "the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law and equity * * * [are] not * * * controlling." Historically, the strict rules of evidence followed in the courts were evolved as a safeguard against erroneous decisions and improper influence upon juries. Such safeguards are unnecessary in proceedings before the National Labor Relations Board because there is no jury and can only serve to hinder the Board in getting all the relevant facts. Further, liberality in admitting evidence cannot of itself cause any prejudice. Where improper evidence so admitted is made the basis of a finding, a clear remedy is available to correct the error in the reviewing courts. Moreover, the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946 already prescribes adequate safeguards and the National Labor Relations Board is subject to its provisions. Finally, the effect of this proposal would be to encumber the administrative process with legalisms and retard or prevent the carrying out of Congressional policy. It may necessitate restricting Board membership to lawyers rather than permitting the present desirable practice of including individuals with special background in the field of labor-management relations.

Section 10 (c) provides that if upon "preponderance" of testimony the Board is of the opinion that unfair labor practices have been committed, the Board shall state its findings of fact and shall issue an order requiring respondent to cease and desist from such unfair labor practice and to take such affirmative action including reinstatement of employees with or without back pay, as will effectuate the policies of the act. Where an order directs reinstatement of an employee, back pay may be required of the employer or labor organization responsible for the discrimination. In determining whether a complaint should issue under section 8 (a) (1) or section 8 (a) (2) and in deciding such cases, the same regulations and rules of decision shall apply irrespective of whether or not the labor organization affected is affiliated. Section 10 (c) further provides that the Board may not order the reinstatement of any employee or the payment of back pay, if such employee was suspended or discharged for cause.

Comment: The provision in section 10 (c) intended to establish so-called equal treatment for affiliated and unaffiliated unions has already been discussed above. The provision limiting the Board's power to order the reinstatement of discharged employees was inserted by the conference committee and is derived from the House bill. This provision would hinder the National Labor Relations Board in the prevention of unfair labor practices. The Board, by its terms, would be required to find, not only that the discharge was in violation of the act, but also that the discharge was not for cause. The effect of this provision is to permit an employer to escape liability for having discharged an employee for his union activities merely if grounds existed which would also justify the employee's discharge. Since an employer can always find some reason for justifying the discharge, this proposal would render a nullity the protection afforded workers by the National Labor Relations Act against discrimination because of union activities. There is no reason why, if the proof shows that an employee has actually been discharged because of his legitimate union activities, the employer should be allowed to escape the consequences of his unlawful conduct of pleading circumstances or conduct which he was perfectly willing to tolerate until the employee became active in the union.

Section 10 (c) also provides that if no exceptions are filed within 20 days after service of a trial examiner's proposed report and recommended order "such recommended order shall become the order of the Board and become effective as therein prescribed."

Comment: This provision is objectionable because it in effect suspends the doctrine of exhaustion of administrative remedies and permits a dissatisfied litigant to sidestep the agency by direct resort to the courts. The agency may thus be called upon to defend a decision it has not made, or be reversed as to rulings which, if error therein had been called to its attention by appropriate appeal, it might have itself corrected. Moreover, the status of trial examiners' reports is already covered by the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946 (sections 8 and 10 (c)) and there is no need at this time for further legislation on this subject.

Section 10 (e) provides for enforcement proceedings in the Circuit Court of Appeals by the Board. Section 10 (f) contains parallel provisions for proceedings brought by "aggrieved" persons for review of a Board order. Both these sections would amend parallel provisions of the National Labor Relations Act to substitute for the familiar phrase, "the findings of the Board as to the facts, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive, "a new phrase reading as follows:

"The findings of the Board with respect to questions of fact if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole shall be conclusive."

Section 10 (j) empowers the National Labor Relations Board to apply to any district court of the United States for a temporary restraining order once a complaint has issued and before determination of the issues by the Board.

Comment: The present National Labor Relations Act, in section 10 (e), grants Circuit Courts of Appeals power to issue temporary restraining orders once a petition for enforcement has been filed in the court, after decision of the matter by the Board. In very few instances has the Board found it necessary to exercise even this power. It may be anticipated that, if this section became law, the Board would be harassed by demands that it seek immediate injunctive relief if unfair labor practices were alleged by either employees or employers. If such applications were made, the clear result would be to throw decision of the merits of such cases into the Federal district courts and thus to oust the Board of jurisdiction, since it is not to be supposed that district courts could act without some inquiry into the merits of the dispute, or that the Board could, at a later date, take a view of the case inconsistent with that of the court. Mere existence of such power might prove a handicap. While in some instances this might prove a speedy remedy, under normal circumstances the Board's docket should be at least as current as that of the district courts. Expeditious handling of cases can better be obtained by adequate funds to enable the Board to act speedily rather than resort to premature consideration of these matters by the courts.

Section 10 (k) in effect provides for the arbitration of work task jurisdictional disputes by the Board itself, unless within 10 days after notice of filing of a charge, the parties to the dispute submit to the Board satisfactory evidence that they have adjusted, or agreed upon methods for the voluntary adjustment of, the dispute.

Comment: This section was amended by the conference committee by striking from the original Senate bill the provision permitting the Board to appoint arbitrators to decide jurisdictional disputes. The determination of jurisdictional disputes requires special technical proficiency not required in the performance of the other functions delegated to the Board. The Senate version would have made it possible for the Board to delegate this function to men who are specially equipped for the purpose. The Board would thus have been able to devote its time to the discharge of its many other responsibilities.

Section 10 (l) would require the Board to apply for injunctions in connection with union unfair labor practices set forth in section 8 (b) (4).

Comment: The immediate requirement of a mandatory injunction is undesirable. The administrative agency charged with the duty of enforcing these provisions should be given discretion to determine whether or not such injunction should be applied for under section 10 (l). Legislative wisdom does not extend to foreseeing all possible contingencies, and circumstances may well arise in which the Government should withhold its hand. Moreover, such weakening of the Norris-LaGuardia Act is undesirable. That act sought to protect workers in their right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing by denying the issuance of injunctions, whether on petition of private persons or officers of the Government, except in the manner and under the conditions set forth in its provisions. The safeguards against Government by injunction which the Norris-LaGuardia Act sought to erect should be preserved.

The mandatory character of this provision contrasts with the discretion vested in the Board in securing injunctions against employers under section 10 (j). In a case involving both an employer unfair-labor practice and a union unfair-labor practice covered by section 10 (l) the anomalous situation would result in which the Board would be required under the provisions of section 10 (l) to accord prior relief to the employer, even if after hearing the Board finds the charges against the union unjustified and the charge against the employer justified.

Section 11: The bill would amend section 11 (l) of the act to require the Board to issue subpenas upon application of any party. Persons subject to such subpenas can petition the Board for an order revoking the subpena upon a proper showing.

Comment: This would change the present law and practice, embodied in the rules and regulations of the National Labor Relations Board and in the Administrative Procedure Act, of issuing subpenas to parties upon a simple statement of the general relevance and scope of the evidence sought to be adduced. Under the bill there would be no discretion in the Board with respect to granting subpenas and no requirement for any showing by parties of relevance or materiality in connection with obtaining subpenas. This proposed change is highly objectionable because it leaves the Board no discretion to prevent harassment of private parties and abuse of the Board's processes by all kinds of improper subpenas and "fishing expeditions" on the mere demand of litigants.

Section 14: Section 14 in subsection (a) declares the right of supervisors to form and join unions but denies them the protection of the National Labor Relations Act and of any local law in the exercise of this right. Section 14 in subsection (b) also provides that nothing in the bill shall be construed as authorizing the execution of any union-security agreement in a State in which such agreements are prohibited.

Comment: The provisions of section 14 (b) are of special interest because of their contrast with the provisions of the proviso to section 10 (a). This proviso permits the Board to cede jurisdiction to a State agency in certain cases only if the applicable State law or decisions are not inconsistent with the provisions of the bill. Section 14 (b), however, expressly provides that in the case where the State law covering union-security agreements is more rigorous than the policy expressed in the bill such State law shall be unaffected.

Sections 102–104: Sections 102–104 provide for the effective date of certain changes. Section 102 provides that the bill shall not make an unfair-labor practice any act which was performed prior to the enactment of the bill which did not constitute an unfair-labor practice prior thereto. Section 102 further protects acts performed pursuant to the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement entered into prior to the enactment date of the bill or, in the case of an agreement for a period of not more than 1 year, entered into between the enactment date and the effective date of the bill, if the performance of such acts would not have constituted an unfair labor practice under section 8 (3) of the National Labor Relations Act.

Section 103 protects certifications issued under the National Labor Relations Act prior to the effective date of the bill. Section 104 provides that the amendments made by the bill shall take effect 60 days after the enactment of the bill. Exception is made in case of the President's authority to appoint certain officers pursuant to section 3.

The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the Bible tells us that by their works you shall know them. I want to speak for a little while about the works of those who claim the principal credit for the pending legislation—the majority party. I know that next year it will be very conspicuous in the campaign speeches of the majority party. I know that legislation affecting labor—and, I would say, against labor—was one of the campaign promises of the majority party in the last election, and I am sure, Mr. President, that that party has coveted the honor of the sponsorship of this particular legislation. Now, if it be good, if the honor be creditable, they deserve the honor, because they have the control of all the committees of the Congress, and the chairman of the Policy Committee of the majority party is the chairman of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, which has brought the pending measure to the Congress, determinedly sponsored it in the Congress, and who no doubt will claim the principal credit for its enactment, should it become the law of the land.

Mr. President, if this so-called labor legislation were an isolated measure it would be more difficult to appraise it in relation to the program and policy of the majority party. But the majority party has been in power in Congress since the first of the year, and this is June. It is now possible to begin to see the perfection of a pattern which that party has been presenting to the Congress and to the country.

I think it is appropriate to call attention to some of the measures which now appear in that picture. For example, the majority party can claim the credit, if it be a credit, for the enactment of the portal-to-portal pay bill, which practically nullified the enforcement of the Fair Labor Standards Act by the Government of the United States, and in the opinion of many constituted a Congressional reversal of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States rendered in respect to the rights of the working people of this land.

I think the majority party is also entitled to the credit, if it be a credit, for the enactment of the recent rent-control legislation, one provision of which, sponsored by a Republican Senator from the good State of New Jersey, able Senator that he is, provided for what I believe will be almost a compulsory increase in rent of 15 percent, and gave to the Congress and to the country an emasculated, ineffective rent-control law. I think if it be a credit, Mr. President, for the ordinary family in America to have its rent raised, for many families to be obliged to leave their homes because they cannot pay the rent increases the landlord may demand—if that be a credit—surely the honor goes, and should go, to the majority party in the present Congress.

Mr. President, we have just enacted some tax legislation. That too was one of the promises of the majority party. The majority party wanted to cut expenditures of the Government. The majority party wanted to relieve the burden upon the back of the heavily laden taxpayer, and so they have labored in the Congress and brought forth a tax bill for the country. My colleague [Mr. HOLLAND] and other Senators, as well as Members of the House, have placed in the RECORD from time to time eloquent statements showing the nature and effect of the remedial tax legislation which the majority party has pressed through the Congress and given to the country, I believe over the solid opposition of the minority party.

I read from page 5937 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 28, where there will be found a table to which I wish to call attention, to show the kind of tax bill the majority party has passed. I believe the table will speak for itself. In the case of a taxpayer with an income of $1,200 a year before personal exemptions, under the present law the married taxpayer without dependents would have left as spendable income $1,162. Under the Republican tax bill the same taxpayer would have left $1,173, or $11 more to spend than he would have left under the present law. That is a 1-percent increase in the spendable income of the taxpayer with a net income, before personal exemptions, of $1,200 a year. That is the credit which the majority party will be able to claim when it goes before the electorate next year on the basis of its performance in the Congress.

Let us take the case of a taxpayer who has a $2,000 net income before personal exemptions. Under the present law that taxpayer would have left $1,810 to spend. Under the majority tax bill he would have left $1,867. By the bounty of the majority party he would have $57 more to spend for his family than he would have under the present law. That is an increase of 3.1 percent in the amount of money the taxpayer would have left. In other words, he is indebted to the Republican Party for having 3.1 percent more money to spend, or $57 more to spend than he would have under the present law. The majority party deserves the credit for that, if it be a credit.

Mr. President, I wish to speak of another taxpayer, a taxpayer who receives $25,000 a year before personal exemptions. Under the present law that taxpayer would have left $15,918. Under the Republican tax bill that taxpayer would have left $17,734, or $1,816 more than he would have left under the present law. But what percentage increase does that represent for that taxpayer? It is 11.4 percent. Remember how much the taxpayer who made $1,200 a year gets from the Republican bill. He gets 1 percent; but the taxpayer who makes $25,000 a year has been so kindly treated by the Republican tax bill that he has left 11.4 percent more money to spend than has the man who receives $1,200 a year.

I want to mention only one other taxpayer. I want to be fair. The Republicans are entitled to credit for this, and I want to emphasize it, so that the taxpayers will know to whom they are indebted for these bounties and munificencies which have been handed to them by the American Congress.

Let us take the taxpayer making $100,000 a year. There are not many Democrats in that class, but a good many Republicans are in that category. I want them to know that the Grand Old Party has been fighting for them in the Congress. I want to show what the Grand Old Party has done. Another way to describe it is the Party of Great Moral Ideas. I want to show what the Republican Party has done for the faithful in the $100,000 class. Under the present law such a taxpayer would have $36,872 left. That was a Democratic tax bill; but under the Republican tax bill he would have left $48,716, an increase in dollars of $11,844, or a percentage increase of 34.2 percent.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. What is the percentage of payment by that taxpayer?

Mr. PEPPER. I do not recall. I believe the rate is graduated from 10 to 30 percent. I believe that between $13,495 and approximately $100,000, the taxpayers are all in the same bracket. Is that not correct?

Mr. MILLIKIN. Under the present law what percentage of his income does he pay in taxes?

Mr. PEPPER. I do not recall just what percentage of income he pays in taxes. I am talking about how much he has left after he pays his taxes. The bill sponsored by the able Senator from Colorado gives a greater percentage of increase in what the taxpayer has left, to the taxpayer in the high brackets than to the taxpayer in the low brackets.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I suggest to the Senator that it is very important to know what percentage he pays under existing law, if the Senator is comparing the results of the new tax bill with those under the present law.

Mr. PEPPER. He pays a very high percentage of his income in taxes.

Mr. MILLIKIN. While the Senator is studying that category of cases, let him consider the cases of taxpayers all the way up and down the scale, and make a study of what they pay and what they have left under existing law.

Mr. PEPPER. I shall be glad to have the able Senator from Colorado, who was the sponsor of the bill, and the chairman of the committee, inform us as to how much a man who makes $100,000 pays. I gave the figure as to what he would have left. If he makes $100,000 before exemptions, under the present law he has left $36,872, so he pays a little more than $60,000 in taxes. Under the Republican bill he would pay $11,844 less in taxes.

Mr. MILLIKIN. That man, while in private employment, is working about 4 days a week for the Federal Government.

Mr. PEPPER. Yes.

Mr. MILLIKIN. How many days does the Senator want him to work?

Mr. PEPPER. I want him to work at least as much as the poor man works for the support of his Government.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Does the Senator want him to work 7 days a week for the Government? There is no alternative to his argument.

Mr. PEPPER. I lay down the premise—and I invite the contest of it by the Senator from Colorado——

Mr. MILLIKIN. I am here to contest it.

Mr. PEPPER. I lay down the premise that when we are giving tax relief to the taxpayers of the country, we ought to give it first to the ones who need it most.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Those who need it most are getting the largest percentage of relief.

Mr. PEPPER. The man who makes $1,200 a year, and who cannot maintain his family according to a decent standard of living, receives an increase of 1 percent in the amount he has left. He saves $11.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Those who receive incomes of under $5,000 pay the most taxes, and they receive the most relief.

Mr. PEPPER. And they should. The large taxpayers should pay the most.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Of course, they should, and they do. The Senator is not advocating any relief for them.

Mr. PEPPER. On the contrary, I voted for the bill of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], which raised income exemptions of the small taxpayer, and I voted for every amendment offered on the floor during the debate which would reduce the taxes of the small taxpayers. The Senator knows that was one of the issues in the Senate between the majority and minority parties—that if we are going to give tax relief, we should give it first to the people at the bottom of the ladder, who need it the most.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Under the Senator's final position, he would rather not give any relief to the man he is talking about than to give him a 30-percent relief.

Mr. PEPPER. If the Senator is implying that, if the President vetoes the bill, there will be no relief for anyone——

Mr. MILLIKIN. The Senator is stating with complete accuracy that the Senator from Florida would rather not have any relief for the people in whom he is so interested than a 30-percent tax cut.

Mr. PEPPER. Rather than go before the country and tell the people that we are giving most of the relief to those who need it least, I would pay on the national debt and not have any tax relief at all. A 30 percent reduction of the tax rate provides practically no relief for the moderate and low income groups.

Mr. MILLIKIN. We are doing no such thing as that. We are giving most of the relief to men earning under $5,000.

Mr. PEPPER. In percentage?

Mr. MILLIKIN. In amount. I will demonstrate that to the Senator.

Mr. PEPPER. I am simply telling the Senator, according to the figures, the amount they have left.

Mr. MILLIKIN. We are giving most in amount to the men earning under $5,000.

Mr. PEPPER. I am giving the Senator the figures of how much they have left. What is of importance to the man who is paying his grocery bill is how much money he has in his pocket. I am saying that there are more dollars in the pockets of the rich than in the pockets of the poor under this Republican bill, and it is simply indicative of the whole pattern of Republican legislation in this Congress, and I am going to show it in case after case.

Mr. MILLIKIN. What percentage of the poor man's income does he pay in taxes?

Mr. PEPPER. He pays more taxes than he should pay.

Mr. MILLIKIN. What percentage does he pay, if the Senator has the table there?

Mr. PEPPER. I will say this to the Senator: The committee has tried to conceal in the bill what the poor man pays.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The committee has not tried to conceal anything. I am asking the Senator what percentage the poor man pays in taxes?

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator can figure up the percentage if he wants to.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The Senator has the table there. He can read it from the table.

Mr. PEPPER. If he has an income of $1,200 before personal exemptions, under the present law he has left $1,162. Under the new bill he would have left $1,173, and would pay approximately $30.

Mr. MILLIKIN. What percentage is that?

Mr. PEPPER. I do not have the percentage in this table.

Mr. MILLIKIN. What does the $100,000 man pay?

Mr. PEPPER. I do not have the percentage on that. He pays approximately 60 percent. If he pays approximately $63,000 out of $100,000, he pays that percentage.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Is not that a generous recognition of ability to pay?

Mr. PEPPER. What I am saying and what I want the Senator to get in his mind is that we have two classes of taxes levied on the people of the country. One is the direct income tax and the other is the excise tax. What I said about concealment was this. There has not been a dime lifted off the backs of the people who pay the excise taxes. Most of them are poor people. Persons receiving under $5,000 a year pay 80 percent of the total excise tax bill. They have not had a dime of tax relief. So that when we say how much a poor man has paid we must take into consideration the excise tax he pays, the gasoline tax, the tax on the automobile tire he buys, the taxes on the bus fare, train fare, and plane fare which he has to pay. In relation to his income he pays a disproportionate share of taxes through the excise tax of which the Republican majority has not lifted a penny.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The Senator's party has had 14 years to correct those inequities. What has his party done about it?

Mr. PEPPER. We had the Republican depression——

Mr. MILLIKIN. There has been no Republican depression during the past 14 years. There were 9 years of depression under the Senator's party.

Mr. PEPPER. Has the Senator forgotten about Hoover?

Mr. MILLIKIN. I have not. But the Hoover depression was continued for 9 years under the Senator's own party, and nothing was done by his party about it.

Mr. PEPPER. The length of time it requires to get out of a hole depends on how deep the hole is—and we were lucky ever to get out of the hole.

Mr. MILLIKIN. It also depends on what effort is made to get out of the hole and the wisdom of the measures employed in that effort.

Mr. PEPPER. If we had not had the Liberty League and the bought press to obstruct us, we would have gotten out more quickly.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The Democratic Party had the benefits in piling up a $50,000,000,000 deficit. Now the Democrats are saying to a party which has been in power for about 6 months, "Why have you not done this?" I answer, "What have you done?"

Mr. PEPPER. When the Democrats were writing tax bills they tried to take into consideration the principle of ability to pay, and they laid the principal part of the burden upon the men who were able to pay. The corollary of that principle would be that when we start to reduce taxes, reduce them first where the need is the greatest. It is a policy to the contrary which has been followed by the Republican Party.

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. JENNER. Is it not a fact that the Senator loves the common man, the poor man of America, so much that he does not want to give him even a 30-percent reduction in his taxes?

Mr. PEPPER. If the Senator wants to put up my affection for the poor man and judge it by my voting record and compare it with that of almost any other Senator on the other side of the aisle—with the exception of two or three Senators on the other side of the aisle—I think the comparison would be favorable to this side.

Mr. JENNER. How much does the Senator love the poor man—so much that he does not want to give him the benefit of a 30-percent reduction now?

Mr. PEPPER. Not if the Senator and his Republican colleagues are going to make the policy effective in favor of the man who receives an income of $100,000 and give him a great deal more in percentage than is given the poor man. The important thing is, How many more dollars does a man have in his pocket under the Republican bill than he would have had otherwise? I can show that per thousand dollars of income——

Mr. JENNER. Will not the 30 percent help the man whom the Senator loves so much?

Mr. PEPPER. Yes; but I want to be judged by my love for the poor man and not by my love for the rich man.

Mr. JENNER. The Democrats have had 14 years to demonstrate their love for the poor man, and nothing has been done about it.

Mr. PEPPER. We have been trying to pay off the Republican deficit. We have been trying to pay for Hoover.

Mr. JENNER. If I have my figures correct, Mr. Hoover left this Nation in debt about $27,000,000,000; but when Mr. Roosevelt——

Mr. PEPPER. And there were 20,000,000 persons unemployed.

Mr. JENNER. When Mr. Roosevelt got through we had a debt of approximately $260,000,000,000.

Mr. PEPPER. Does the Senator know what the difference in the national income was after that? It might be pertinent to remember that the national income was $38,000,000,000 in Hoover's time, in the Hoover era of America, and in the Roosevelt era it got up to nearly $170,000,000,000. It took a $200,000,000,000 increase in the national debt to conquer fascism. It took a $25,000,000,000 increase during a Democratic administration to reduce the Hooverized unemployment which we Democrats inherited from the Republicans by 50 percent.

Mr. JENNER. Wait a minute.

Mr. PEPPER. And the debt could have been paid off by the difference in the value of the assets of this country in 1 year.

Mr. JENNER. We have a lot of baloney dollars floating around; I will admit that. But I wonder if the poor man is any better off than he was?

Mr. PEPPER. We did not even have baloney dollars in Hoover's time.

Mr. JENNER. Does the Senator know when the Hoover depression ended?

Mr. PEPPER. It started ending on the day Hoover went out of office.

Mr. JENNER. Is that correct?

Mr. PEPPER. It started ending on the 4th of March 1933. Does the Senator remember that? That was the beginning of the end.

Mr. JENNER. This is what I do remember: That from 1933 up until the time we went into the war there were still 10,000,000 Americans walking the streets of the Nation unemployed. I will tell the Senator when the Hoover depression ended. It ended when the New Deal entered World War II, and not until then. Let us not talk about Democrats; let us talk about New Dealers.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator has given me some interesting information. I suppose he means now to charge that the war was a Democratic war?

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, let us not talk about New Dealers; let us talk about Democrats. I love Democrats.

Mr. PEPPER. If the Senator wishes to take that position before his country, he is perfectly at liberty to do so.

Mr. JENNER. I do take that position.

Mr. PEPPER. Very well; I shall let the Senator's statement stand the judgment of history.

Mr. JENNER. That is all right. Let history also judge the fact that 10,000,000 men were unemployed during the New Deal administration when our country went into World War II.

Mr. PEPPER. Yes; there were 10,000,000 unemployed at that time, perhaps only half the number of Americans who were unemployed during the Hoover regime, for it is obvious that if 10,000,000 men were unemployed immediately prior to World War II that would show that at that time just 10,000,000 more Americans had jobs than was the case when Mr. Hoover went out of office.

Mr. JENNER. In other words, is the Senator saying that there were 20,000,000 unemployed in Mr. Hoover's time?

Mr. PEPPER. That is right.

Mr. JENNER. According to that, all of us were selling apples to each other. [Laughter.]

Mr. PEPPER. Not exactly, only 20,000,000 unemployed and not 60,000,000—but many of the unemployed Americans who were selling applies in those days were American veterans.

Mr. JENNER. O Mr. President, I will see the Senator from Florida after lunch. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PEPPER. I shall yield in a moment.

Mr. President, I am predicting that if the policies which now are being pursued by the majority party are continued there will be another recession, and the majority party will be entitled to claim the credit for it, too. It will be Hoover depression No. 2, or perhaps we might say it will be the little Hoover depression.

I do not know of anything more indicative of the general policy and trend and character of the Republican program than the prominence which Mr. Hoover has now reacquired in the leadership of his party. I do not say that as a personal disparagement; I am not speaking about the former President of the United States in a personal way with the slightest disparagement; but I say that he and his policies stand convicted by the people of the United States as contrary to the public interest; and when anyone begins to put those policies again into practice and begins to pursue a similar policy, I anticipate that the inevitable result will be something equally contrary to the public interest.

Mr. President, I was talking about the taxpayers. Now let us examine a few of the appropriations which have been controlled by the majority party. Let us consider the Bureau of the Budget's requests for the Department of Labor. Let us remember that it is the Department which has to do with the welfare of the working men and women of America. The Bureau of the Budget's request for 1948 appropriations for the Department of Labor was $103,578,000, and in the House of Representatives the Republican majority there reduced that amount to $89,864,000, and in the Senate it was reduced to $79,862,000.

In other words, the majority party evidently wishes to diminish and impair the ability of the Department of Labor to serve the people of this country, including—and I shall come to that—its effort to resolve industrial disputes and prevent work stoppages.

Now, let us consider the appropriations for the Conciliation Service of the Department of Labor. The Conciliation Service is the branch of the Department of Labor whose duty it has been to try to stop strikes and to settle disputes. But let us see what the majority party has done to the appropriations for the Conciliation Service. The Budget request was $2,678,000. The House of Representatives reduced that to $2,080,000—representing a diminution of almost $600,000 in the appropriations for the agency which was created by the Government of the United States to try to settle disputes and prevent work stoppages. In the Senate the appropriation for that agency was cut to $2,200,000.

Now let us consider the appropriations for the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor. It is the branch of Government which tries to see to it that the workman at the bottom of the ladder receives his measly 40 cents an hour; that is all. He is guaranteed by law 40 cents an hour for his work. In interstate commerce that agency of the Government is designed to see that the workman receives the 40 cents an hour which the law entitles him to receive.

But what did the majority party do with that Budget request? In the House of Representatives it was cut from $5,204,000 to $3,748,000, and in the Senate it was cut to $3,847,000, despite the passage of the portal-to-portal pay bill, imposing additional functions on that Division.

Mr. President, the appropriation for the Federal Security Agency is worthy of attention. The budget request was $976,370,000. In the House of Representatives it was reduced to $899,045,000, and in the Senate to $899,688,000.

Now let us consider the appropriations for vocational education. Vocational education is given to those persons in our economic life who need some training in order to make a better economic adjustment in industry. By means of vocational education they receive training which enables them to do other work as trained persons. However, despite that laudable purpose, the budget request for that agency, which was $29,301,000, was cut by the House of Representatives to $14,200,000, and was set at $17,750,000 by the Senate.

Mr. President, let us now consider the appropriations for vocational rehabilitation. Vocational rehabilitation is given to those persons in our economic life whose limbs are broken during the course of their employment or who in some other way become handicapped as the result of accidents in industry. By means of rehabilitation they are trained to adjust themselves to make a living. The budget request was $20,439,000. That was cut to $18,500,000 by the House of Representatives, and to $18,000,000 by the Senate.

Mr. President, let us now consider the appropriations for 1948 for the Department of Agriculture. Oh, the Grand Old Party has always professed to be a friend of the farmer and to help agriculture, notwithstanding the fact that when the Republicans were last in power, farms were being foreclosed all over the United States and the situation was so desperate that food was being burned at a time when millions of Americans were hungry. In respect to the 1948 appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, the Budget request was $805,141,000. That was cut by the House of Representatives to $572,172,000. That bill has not yet come to the Senate.

Mr. President, I wish to refer now to the school-lunch program, which is a program aided by the Federal Government and matched by the States, by which the school children of America are guaranteed at least one warm, nutritious meal a day. The purpose is not only to enable them to learn better in the schools, but to enable them to live better in America, and to see to it that if an enemy again attacks our land, they will be able to defend it, and will not be rejected by Selective Service for physical or mental deficiency. Mr. President, what did the Grand Old Party do to the school-lunch program? The bill is now in the House of Representatives. The appropriation was cut from $75,000,000 to $45,000,000, and the House also knocked out $6,000,000 for the purchase of surplus food under section 32 of the AAA Act.

Mr. President, I am saying nothing less than that, in order to give the man making $100,000 a year $11,844 in tax reduction, or a percentage increase in spendable income of 34.2 percent, the present Republican majority in Congress would take a good meal a day out of the mouths and bodies of the school children of America. It comes down to that, Mr. President. It is a part of the sacrifice they have exacted; it is a part of the price they have made the people and children of America pay. In order to reduce the taxes of the rich, they would actually take food out of the mouths of the school children of America. From our State my colleague and I have received letters in which it is stated that it has been impossible even to match the State's contribution; yet they have been denied the right to use the income from the lunches they sell to the children who can afford to pay, so that they can give more food to the children who cannot afford the few cents each noon that would be required for the meal that might be served. Mr. President, any party that ignores the welfare of the children of America is not thinking soundly about the essential strength and power of this land of ours.

The Republican majority in Congress cut out availability of $150,000,000 under section 32 for the purchase of surplus farm products. What does that mean? Under section 32 of the Triple-A Act, when tariffs—and they have usually been Republican tariffs—are collected on imports of agricultural products into this country, they are placed in a fund which is used to help agriculture in America. If there is a glut in the citrus market, if it is impossible to sell citrus products, it is the funds of the Surplus Commodities Corporation which might come to the aid of the growers, and to the aid of every other agricultural industry in America. But that has been completely cut out, and the money that comes from the tariffs on imported agricultural products is taken away from the agriculture of this land and deposited in the Federal Treasury, so that it will be possible to make further reductions in the taxes of those who are most able to pay.

Mr. President, that means that we are not only going to be denied a market we now have for our agricultural commodities, but it means many a child and old man or old woman in some part of our Nation who has been the beneficiary of the food which has been bought under that program, will not get it in the future. That is the significance of what has been done in respect to that matter.

Now I wish to mention another feature. We hear talk about the New Deal. Go forth in America today, in almost every section of this land, and see the little farm house; approach it in the evening and see the glow of an electric light breaking from the friendly windows. Who put it there? Every one of those lights should have on it the initials "F. D. R." It was Franklin D. Roosevelt and his party that had the courage and the stamina to fight the Power Trust of America, and put electricity in the homes of the rural population and in the homes of the poor, throughout the length and breadth of this land.

It will be remembered how the power trust fought that movement, how they denounced it, the hundreds of thousands of telegrams they initiated which came here in an effort to discredit the Utility Control Act. But the Democratic administration forced it through the Congress, and the Democrats have maintained and supported it ever since, because they believe in it.

Has anyone seen the Democratic administration cutting down the funds of the REA? They have been trying to increase them, because our goal should be to have electricity in every rural home in America, and at a price the farmer can afford to pay. Even the tenant farmer is entitled to it. But what did the Republican House do? They cut $25,000,000 from the REA budget request, and thereby 25 percent fewer farms will be able to get electricity in 1947 and 1948.

Mr. President, let it be remembered that the money expended by that agency is not charity, it is not a Federal grant. Every dollar of that money is to be paid back. It is merely a loan to the beneficiaries. These projects are self-supporting because they are so wisely conceived and executed.

Mr. President, ride along the rural highways of America, back into the out-of-the-way places, and note the houses from which the only light that gleams is the flickering flame of a little lamp or a candle. In those instances we might as well put up a Republican sign saying, "These homes cannot have REA, but we are going to cut taxes so that the man who makes $100,000 a year will have $11,844 more to spend than he has been having in the past, or an increase of spendable income of more than one-third."

Mr. President, these are all facts, and they are all the representations of what has been done by the House of Representatives in respect to the agricultural appropriation.

Let me take now the Interior Department appropriation. The Interior Department budget request was cut by the House from $295,420,000 to $161,413,000. They cut the Bureau of Reclamation budget request by $145,952,000. What does that mean? I am speaking as a southern Senator for reclamation projects, but the Senators from the West, some of whom are on the floor of the Senate now, without regard to party, have stood here and decried and denounced the disservice that is being done to the great West by the refusal of the Republican majority to carry on the great reclamation program which has been initiated and carried forward so splendidly under the Democratic administration.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGRATH in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. MURRAY. Those programs, too, are all reimbursable. Every dollar that is to be expended in the development of those reclamation projects, and the construction of the dams in the West, is repayable with interest. Notwithstanding that, the majority is proposing to block the development of projects in my State of Montana which are absolutely essential. They are cutting the funds, too, for soil conservation, thus permitting the waste of the top soil. It seems to me that the Senator is performing a very fine service in bringing out these facts, to show the unfairness and the political dishonesty of those in the Congress who are making these proposals.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the Senator from Montana. The Senator from Montana, who has just spoken, is a Democrat, but I have heard words just as strong from Senators on the other side of the aisle who represent western States. I particularly remember the Senator from Oregon and other Senators on the majority side, who are as much opposed to these cuts as are we on this side of the aisle.

Mr. President, had it not been for the great dams which were built under the Roosevelt administration, when there was a Democratic majority in the Congress, I dare say we could not have won the war, at least with the loss of as few lives, or as quickly as we did. Responsible authorities said that we could not have won the war without the aluminum and the other materials which came, directly or indirectly, from those great power projects—the Tennessee Valley Authority, Bonneville, Grand Coulee, and the other projects built under the Democratic administration.

When our soil is wasting away, when power is running without value down the streams into the salty sea, and it is proposed, as a contribution to the national wealth, to save the soil and harness our streams, and make them serve man with food and light and power, a short-sighted policy of Republican economy says no. They would rather reduce taxes on those most able to pay than to continue those programs for the people of America.

Mr. President, for the Commerce Department there was a budget request of $286,989,000. Mr. Henry Wallace, or some New Dealer whom the Republicans might seek to discredit, was not the Secretary of Commerce who submitted those figures. They were submitted by Mr. Averell Harriman's department. Mr. Averell Harriman is one of the successful businessmen of America, trying to help business as Secretary of Commerce. His Department submitted a budget request, through the President, for $286,989,000. How much did it get? It got $194,305,000. That is the agency of the Government primarily charged with helping big and little business in America, trying to keep this Nation prosperous, trying to keep employment at the peak, trying to keep the national income high, trying to preserve the well-being of all the people of America. Yet, Mr. President, in order to reduce the taxes of the man who is making $100,000 a year, so that he will have to spend nearly $12,000 more than he has had, and, similarly, to favor other people who need it less, the majority are willing to cut the budget of the Department of Commerce, and contribute to another depression.

The United States Treasury budget was $2,550,000,000. That was cut to $1,671,000,000 by the House and to $1,710,000,000 by the Senate.

Mr. President, these are merely illustrative considerations which I have given. But what has been done for Federal aid to education? What has been done to help the States of America give their children a better education? Oh, if the majority in Congress were devoted to the public interest, would they not be in favor of public education first? Would they want to deny to any child in this land a chance to go to school, and to a good school, and for at least 9 months a year? Why have not the majority party given us a Federal-aid bill? I think I read in the newspapers that their party, on the other side of the Capitol, said there was not going to be any legislation this year on Federal aid to education. Mr. President, I believe in putting first things first. I would give the children of America a chance to get an education before I would cut the taxes of taxpayers who are already living according to a standard of living far above that of the average American family and the average American home.

With regard to housing, what legislation has been passed? I want to commend the Senator from Ohio. The Wagner-Taft-Ellender bill, or the Ellender-Taft-Wagner bill, or the Taft-Wagner-Ellender bill, however it may be styled, is a forward step. The Senator from Ohio has associated himself courageously with the housing program. But his party is in power; he is chairman of the Policy Committee of the United States Senate; and I understand the Senator is very influential in the other House. Why has not the Congress passed housing legislation? I hope that it will go on the must list of the majority party. By the end of the session, we shall see whether they put housing for the American people and education for the American people as high on the must list as they put the portal-to-portal bill or the bill to limit the tenure of the President of the United States below what the people might choose to award him; in other words, the post-Roosevelt attack on Roosevelt, when the Congress, in the earlier stages of this session, demanded and pushed through a measure saying that a man could not be elected President of the United States if he had served as much as 11 years, even if every qualified voter in America wanted to vote for him for that office. They could not defeat Roosevelt while he was alive, but, after he died, they were able to regulate the number of terms his successor might be able to enjoy.

So I say, if those things have been on the must list, why have not public education and public housing, like the tax bill and these other proposals, been put on the must list?

The President recommended health legislation. He recommended, again, a National Health Insurance Act, to make it possible for the people of America to budget their health cost and their health care. The bill introduced is now before the committee, but nobody is sanguine enough to believe that it has any chance. No, the bill that is primarily being considered is the Taft bill, a bill that appropriates $200,000,000 to aid the States in giving medical charity to the people of America. If one is willing to meet a means test, if he is willing to go up and whisper, and say, "I can't pay," and admit it; if he is willing to humiliate himself by claiming and accepting charity, it will do that much good—$200,000,000 worth. But, Mr. President, the President of the United States recommended an American health bill that would be based on the American principle of insurance. A worker would pay 1½ percent of his wages or salary up to $300 a month; the employer, as in the case of social security, would pay the same amount; and whatever might be needed would be appropriated by the Federal Government. That would make available to almost every man, woman, and child in America a doctor, a nurse, a surgeon, a hospital, X-rays, and the medical care generally that the citizen might need. That is democracy, Mr. President. But does anyone think the majority party is likely to look with favor upon that recommendation by the President of the United States? That is not on the must list, nor is even the Taft bill on the must list. The health of America can wait; public education can wait; reclamation can wait; but we have got to give tax relief to the rich, Mr. President. That is what it all boils down to.

What has been done for the veterans, Mr. President? Have their benefits been increased? Are we going to take tax reductions and give them to the veterans? No, Mr. President; the veterans who fought at Okinawa and the Solomon Islands, and everywhere else upon our broad battle front, and who are now in school are trying to live on $65 a month. They and their families are trying to live on $90 a month. A man in on-the-job training, if he is single, is trying to live on $175 a month. If he has a wife and four children, he is limited by law to $200 a month. Mr. President, the Veterans' Subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, the other afternoon, recommended certain increases, and there was splendid bipartisan cooperation from the Senator from New York [Mr. IVES], who is now on the floor, from the chairman of that subcommittee, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], and also from the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER], who was present. But does anyone suppose we are going to get that bill through the main committee? Does he suppose we are going to get it through the Senate? What we proposed in the subcommittee was to raise the benefit for the veteran in school, who is single, under the GI bill to $75 a month; for the man with a wife, to $105 a month; and for a man with a wife and at least one child, to $120 a month. We proposed to raise to the ceiling in on-the-job training from $175 a month to $200 a month for the single man, and to $250 a month for the married man. We also proposed to provide about $10,000,000 worth of automobiles for the veteran with one or both of his legs off at the ankle or above; with one or both of his hands off, or lost to use; and also for the veteran who is blind. I do not know whether the attitude of the majority is going to be favorable toward that or not. They are going to say, "We cannot spend any more money," I am afraid. "Let the veteran totter down the street, hobbling on his artificial limb. We cannot give him an automobile. We have got to save money, so we can cut taxes on the rich." I hope I shall be disappointed, but I am calling attention to the situation. Let us see whether the full committee, headed by the chairman of the policy committee of the majority party, supports our subcommittee, where his party was also in the majority. Let us see whether his party supports that recommendation on the Senate floor and in the House of Representatives. If they do, they will be entitled to the credit. But, the way the pattern has been forming, it looks as though that legislation does not have very much chance, Mr. President. It is not on anybody's "must" list.

The minimum wage is now 40 cents an hour. We know what the standard of living of a man making 40 cents an hour is for himself and his family. We know they cannot have even the bare necessities of life. We know that many of the rejects for selective service came from the homes of the poor. But there has been pending here for months legislation introduced by the Democrats generally. I believe one bill was introduced by the minority leader and the Senator from Indiana, for a minimum of 65 cents an hour; but that has not been put on anybody's "must" list. Our bill sets 75 cents an hour. We are going to introduce another one, setting 65 to 75 cents an hour, by an escalator scale. Have Senators heard of that being on any "must" list of the majority party? No; that means more wages for the poor. But let anything be proposed for the rich, and the legislative process reminds one of the alacrity of the flea; it really goes somewhere, in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, I have already mentioned social security, and the farmers, and their situation. I have here a business report that appeared in the Wall Street Journal. The report goes on to say that it finds increasing signs that the boom is fading; individual savings tumble; credit buying skyrockets; the building boom lags; unemployment increases. That is all in the Wall Street Journal of May 14, 1947. It goes on to say:

> Unemployment rolls are nudging upward. The Bureau of Labor Statistics is not alarmed, but concedes that the number of gainful workers this summer will be well under earlier optimistic predictions.

It goes on in case after case and shows signs of an oncoming economic storm. Mr. President, I say that instead of trying to take purchasing power away from the people we should now try to build it up to counteract the recession which is already in progress.

Mr. President, have you ever been where the waves of the sea lave the shore and gradually undermine an edifice?

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. FLANDERS. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Florida that the Republican tax bill does just the thing he was suggesting. It increases the purchasing power of the people.

Mr. PEPPER. I appreciate the comment of the Senator from Vermont, but the trouble is that under the new tax bill most of the benefits in dollars are given to the people in the higher income brackets.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. Let me finish my statement. Mr. President, I say that because the majority, the masses of the people, the people making less than $10,000 a year, have three times as much purchasing power as the people making in excess of $10,000 a year. Yet the amount that is given to the small taxpayer is very meager—and that is the important thing, Mr. President—whereas the greater part of the total reduction has been given to the people best able to pay. As was pointed out by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], if we were going to help purchasing power we would have added to the exemptions of the poor so they would have had more money, and then they would have contributed more to the purchasing power of the country than would the people in the higher income brackets.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. FLANDERS. Has the Senator from Florida any figures as to the aggregate of saving and increased purchasing power in the lower income brackets as compared to the aggregate in the higher income brackets?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, those figures were placed in the RECORD by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]. I thought I had the volume of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in which they occur. I am not sure that I do. But the Senator from Wyoming proceeded to show that the great volume of saving in dollars went to the people in the high income brackets, and that is, of course, borne out by the figures I have given here—that the man making $1,200 a year, without any exemption, at the end of the year, under the Republican bill, would have about $11 more than he otherwise would have had; but the man making $100,000 a year would have $11,844 more at the end of the year than he otherwise would have had. In other words, his purchasing power would be increased by 34 percent, whereas the purchasing power of the $1,200-a-year man would be increased by 1 percent.

What I now say, Mr. President, is, as the Senator from Illinois argued in the Senate, that if we really wanted to preserve the prosperity of the country we would have given these reductions to the masses of the people in an effective amount, instead of to those who needed the reductions less.

Mr. President, why do I bring up these matters? I bring them up because I aver that all these discriminations against the poor in favor of the rich are a part of the same policy and pattern with the labor bill we are considering here today. I say that the labor bill, like the tax bill, is going to be more burdensome to the poor than to the rich. It is going to place exactions and loads upon the backs of the workers, and not put them on the backs of the employers. I say that the bill is going to drive wages down. If I were to apply a name to the labor bill, I would say it is a bill to cheapen labor in America, because that is exactly the effect it is going to have.

Mr. President, why do I say that? I say that because the organization of labor, which means the labor union, has been the principal instrument by which the wages of the workers of America have been lifted—that and the legislation fixing a minimum wage for a certain class of workers, though the latter applies only to the class at the very bottom of the economic level. The chief weapon the worker has had is the principle of collective security, collective bargaining. That means the workers could work together.

Yesterday I quoted from the former Chief Justice of the United States, Mr. Taft. I am not sure that his distinguished son has in his policy today the liberal understanding of the purpose and the effect of the labor movement that this eminent father wrote into the language I shall read. This is what Chief Justice Taft had to say about the labor unions:

> Labor unions are recognized by the Clayton Act as legal when instituted for mutual help and lawfully carrying out their legitimate objects. They have long been thus recognized by the courts. They were organized out of the necessities of the situation. A single employee was helpless in dealing with an employer. He was dependent ordinarily on his daily wage for the maintenance of himself and family. If the employer refused to pay him the wages that he thought fair, he was, nevertheless, unable to leave the employ and to resist arbitrary and unfair treatment. Union was essential to give laborers opportunity to deal on equality with their employer.

Mr. President, I lay it down as a premise that anything which deprives labor of the power to deal on equality with an employer is contrary to the interest of labor, and my authority is the former Chief Justice, the former President of the United States, Mr. Chief Justice William Howard Taft.

I say that the labor bill now before us was designed for the purpose of weakening the worker in his bargaining with his employer. It had as its principal aim and intent and design the crushing of the power of the labor unions of America, because many people felt that they were asking too much for the workers of America. Do Senators know that two-thirds of the families of the United States now make less than $2,000 a year? Are they rich? Are they receiving too much? Do Senators know that the Federal Reserve Board made a survey of the savings of the poor and found that two out of five families in America had total liquid savings of less than $40? Are the workers of America receiving too much, Mr. President? Do we in the Congress have to strike down their bargaining power?

I ask that question because in 1946, 82 percent of the hours lost on account of strikes were over disputes respecting wages and hours. The workers were trying to obtain more pay. Seventy-five percent of all the workers on strike in 1945 were on strike because of disputes affecting wages and hours. The labor-union movement of America has tried to obtain more wages and shorter hours and better working conditions for the working men and women of America.

Mr. President, I have here a copy of the United States News, issue of June 6, 1947, which contains an article under the following heading:

Are jobs to become scarce? Estimates that unemployment will climb to 7,000,000 next year.

I call attention to that article. A reading of it should convince Congress that instead of today weakening the labor union we ought to try to strengthen the labor union so as to keep employers from cutting wages when they do not have to do so. Oh, it may be said, "They will not cut wages when they do not have to." Mr. President, I wish that were true. But I cited here in an earlier debate on this subject that the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., the largest monopoly in America, has had an unbroken record of a $9 yearly dividend for 23 years, and not once during the depression did that company reduce the dividend by a dime, but it did fire 150,000 workers.

It is proposed to weaken the power of labor unions to strike, to use their economic strength. The question may be asked, Should they use their economic strength? Chief Justice Taft said they had a right to use their economic strength. In the opinion from which I read he said:

Union was essential to give laborers opportunity to deal on equality with their employer. They united to exert influence upon him and to leave him in a body, in order by this inconvenience to induce him to make better terms with them. They were withholding their labor of economic value to make him pay what they thought it was worth.

If we take away that power to make him pay what their labor is worth, the power to inconvenience and to rob him of profit by striking, by stopping work, by withholding their labor, I ask, How many businessmen anxious to please directors and stockholders will withstand the temptation to cut wages but to let dividends remain the same, to let surplus pile up, and let the financial structure of the corporation remain unimpaired?

So I say that a labor bill which weakens labor weakens America. Not only does it diminish our production, but it impairs purchasing power, not to speak of the standard of living of the people.

Why do I say that this bill will have such results. First, I wish to advert to the changes which have been made in the Senate bill. I thought the Senate bill itself struck almost a fatal blow at the organized-labor movement of America. But the conference committee was not satisfied to stop with the Senate bill. It added to it. I should like to call attention to the respects in which the conference committee has changed the Senate bill. My references will be to the conference committee print issued May 30, 1947.

On page 6, in section 2, they have so limited the definition of "agent" as to limit the liability of the employer for wrongs to labor. What do I mean by that? Under the old law, anyone who was acting in the interest of the employer was able to bind the employer. He did not have to be specifically authorized technically as an agent. If he was in the position of the employer and was acting in his interest, he could bind the employer for liability for a wrong against labor. That liability has been diminished. Now before the employer can be held responsible for a wrong to labor the man who does the wrong must be specifically an agent or come within the technical definition of an agent. That change has been made in line 15 on page 6.

I pass on to page 10 of the committee print, dealing with the National Labor Relations Board. Nearly everything that could have been done to impair the efficiency of the Board has been done. In the first place, the membership has been enlarged. It is never possible to get quite the same efficiency in a larger body as in a smaller body. In the next place, the Board itself, as has been pointed out by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], is no longer able to administer its own business with the efficiency with which it has done so in the past. For example, in the past it could have a review agency to act as a sort of intermediary, to make studies and recommendations upon cases, and aid the Board in expediting its business. With the hundreds of thousands of cases coming before the Board, limited as the Board is so that it must personally and directly make every decision, and may not have the intermediary agency to which I have referred, the Board will not be able to keep up with its work and give the protection to the workers which the Board was primarily created to provide.

Another significant change has been made by the conference committee. I refer to page 11, section 3, subsection (d). The conference committee created the office of general counsel. The general counsel is to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Nevertheless, the general counsel is to have absolute power over the field organization and the attorneys employed by the Board. Even more important, he is to determine when a complaint shall be acted upon by the Board. In other words, one man is made the arbiter of every case that comes before the attention of the Board. The Board has no authority to decide whether a case should be brought, or whether a complaint should be acted upon. That exclusive power is given to one lawyer, provided for by the conference report. That is contrary to what I believe to be sound public policy.

Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

That is what the National Labor Relations Act provided. It gave workers the power and the right to organize and to work collectively for their common good. But the conference report has added to that language the following provision: "and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities except to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment as authorized in section 8 (a) (3)."

That may sound innocent on its face, but I point out the possibility that that section may be used as the basis for future "yellow dog" contracts. Under that language I believe that if a worker has a right not to organize, not to join a union, he can agree with his employer not to join a union. He can accept employment on the condition that he will not join a union. That is a "yellow dog" contract, which is infamous in the labor history of America. That is just another instance to show that every inducement is held out to weaken the union, to make organization more difficult or ineffective, to strengthen the hand of the employer and weaken the hand of the worker who is reaching out for a living wage for himself and his family.

I pass now to page 16, subsection (b) of section 8, defining unfair labor practices. For the first time it is made an unfair labor practice to restrain or coerce workers, thereby practically prohibiting a labor union from trying to encourage membership or persuading a group of workers to a common policy. I believe that provision was in the Senate bill. That is not new in the conference report.

I pass to page 18, section 8, subsection (b) (4) (D), dealing with jurisdictional strikes. The President of the United States made a recommendation about jurisdictional strikes. What did he say? I read from page 136 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 6 of this year, from the address of the President to the joint session of Congress:

First under this point are jurisdictional strikes. [Applause.] In such strikes the public and the employer are innocent bystanders who are injured by a collision between rival unions.

The President said he recommended legislation to resolve disputes of a jurisdictional character between rival unions.

But in the conference, Mr. President, here is what has been added. I am reading from lines 11 and 12:

Or in a particular trade, craft, or class.

In line 13:

In another trade, craft, or class.

This is the way the Senate bill read:

It shall be an unfair labor practice * * * forcing or requiring any employer to assign particular work to employees in a particular labor organization—

Meaning a union—

rather than to employees in another labor organization.

That meant another union. That carried out a recommendation of the President, but the conference has provided these other words:

Or in a particular trade, craft, or class.

What does that mean? That means that if in a given plant there is a carpenters' group, we will say, engaged in certain work, the employer, if he wishes to break the effect of the union, can start transferring work, not to another union, but to another craft or class or another trade. He need not transfer it to a union. He can transfer work from a union to the nonunion group, and thereby break the union by taking the work away from them. It is another case not of doing what the President and the people of the country want, which is to resolve jurisdictional strikes and bring about some kind of a solution which will be effective, but the bill and the conference report deny unions the right to strike and effectively to protest against their work being taken away from them and given to nonunion workers. That is not the case of a jurisdictional strike; it is a denial of the right of the workers to defend themselves by their collective action. The American Federation of Labor would be particularly affected by this provision, because they have more craft unions than does the CIO or any other union organization to my knowledge.

Moving on, Mr. President, to subparagraph (5)—I am still referring to section 8—the right is given to refuse to recognize a union, to deal with a union, or to give a union their rights under the law, if they charge a fee in an amount which the Board finds excessive or discriminatory under all the circumstances.

Please understand that all these things I am describing are added onto the Senate bill for the first time. The Board is given the power to fix the union dues that are to be charged to the members of the union, who have constitutions and bylaws and democratic voting rights in their own organization. I aver that a labor union has as much right to fix its own dues as has the lodge to which I belong, or the church to which I belong. That is their business. They do not need the protection of the majority party or of the National Labor Relations Board, in my opinion. Conditions differ. I think it is a democratic privilege to elect their own officers, to provide their own constitution and bylaws, and to fix the dues that shall be paid into the organization which they control.

It is another case of interference in the affairs of the union in order to weaken it in relation to the problem it has to meet. If a union has the right to strike, it will need relief funds for its workers who are out on strike. The Board can say, "We do not recognize your right to build up surplus for the workers." But no one is going to tell the corporation which is the employer that it cannot build up a surplus for hard times. This is another case of discrimination against the workers in favor of the employers.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. There is no such restriction unless a union wants to insist on a closed shop and insist that every employee be fired unless they are members of the union. That is the case in which that provision applies. We say, "If you want a closed shop you cannot have a closed union. You must conduct your union so that anyone can be admitted to it on an equal and non-discriminatory basis."

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the Senator for making it doubly clear that before they can really be recognized in the enjoyment of the rights of a union they have got to submit to that kind of meddling in the affairs of their organization. They have got to let the Board fix the dues to provide a surplus and to provide the relief funds of the union and make them available to furnish assistance to the workers.

Mr. President, I pass on to the next subject I wish to consider, which is paragraph (6), which reads as follows:

> To cause or attempt to cause an employer to pay or deliver or agree to pay or deliver any money or any other thing of value, in the nature of an exaction, for services which are not performed or not to be performed.

We had some discussion regarding that yesterday. The able Senator from Ohio submitted his views. I asked the Senator from Ohio two questions: First, what about the case of a group of women workers who demand of the employer a 15-minute rest period every morning, and maybe another one in the afternoon, and who demand pay for the time they are resting? That comes within the language of the bill, in my opinion. At least it is a litigable subject, and this bill is replete with opportunities on the part of employers to sue the unions, to claim an injunction, or to claim some kind of redress from the National Labor Relations Board.

I pointed out another case to the Senator from Ohio. In the contracts of most of the unions I am told that a worker reports for work in the morning. The employer may say, "I do not have anything for you today." The worker has gotten up and gone there. He is ready. Under union contracts the worker can get pay for that day, though he does not work. If he strikes or threatens to strike for such a provision in the contract he comes squarely within this language of demanding pay for a time when he did not work. This is a subject of litigation, and I shall come later to a provision of the bill which will show that one of the ways that the employer can wreck a union is to keep his high-price corporation counsel busily engaged suing the union, attaching its funds, and in other ways making the operation of the union impossible or extremely difficult.

I come to the next subsection, (c), which reads as follows:

> The expressing of any views, argument, or opinion, or the dissemination thereof, whether in written, printed, graphic, or visual form, shall not constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice under any of the provisions of this act, if such expression contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit.

What does that mean?

First, let me state what the law is at the present time. Under the present law, it is an unfair labor practice for an employer to discharge a worker because he attempts to organize or to join a union. The question is always at issue in such a case before the National Labor Relations Board as to what was the real reason for the discharge of the employee. Was he incompetent? Did he violate the rules of the company? Or was he discharged because he was trying to organize or to join a union? The Board has to take all the evidence. It has to have a trial, the way a court would, to determine what was in the mind of the employer when he fired the worker. Why did he fire him? Under the present law, in such a trial anything the employer wishes to introduce, as in a civil or criminal trial, if it is relevant, can be admitted in evidence and considered by the Board.

Suppose 10 workers are fired. Under the present law they make a complaint to the National Labor Relations Board. The Board has a trial to determine from the evidence what was the reason for the discharge of those 10 workers. Was it because they were trying to organize a union in that plant, or was it because they were the 10 most inefficient workers in the organization? Under the present law, if someone heard the employer say, "I hate labor unions; they are a menace to America," that statement could be admitted in evidence. The Board could consider it and weigh it in connection with the act of the employer in discharging those 10 workers. But there were some good lawyers working on this conference report. Some very able, competent lawyers were working on it. They provided that what a man says or writes or prints cannot even be put in evidence unless the statement itself is complete with a threat. In that connection, let us consider a comparable situation; namely, a case in criminal law. Suppose a defendant is on trail for murder, and suppose he has an alibi; suppose he says, "I am a good friend of the deceased. I did not have anything to do with his death. I was somewhere else." Suppose a witness states that a week before the murder the defendant said, "I hate that fellow. He ought to be dead." That testimony would be admissible in any court in the United States; but under this bill, by analogy, it could not be admitted unless the defendant said, "I hate that fellow. He ought to be dead, and I am going to kill him next Saturday night with a pistol." Mr. President, is that fair? Is it designed to give the worker fair protection?

That indicates the way this bill is simply riddled with such hidden knives to strike at the heart of labor. That is why the bill is so much more dangerous than appears on its face.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Some time ago the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] had a discussion relative to the Interior Department appropriation bill, as passed by the House of Representatives. I wish to make a comment about it, but I waited to call the attention of the able Senator from Florida to it until a time when the Senator from Montana had returned to the Chamber. Let me say I am sure the able Senator from Florida wishes to have the record straight and the facts correctly stated.

Mr. PEPPER. I do.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I come from a western State. California is about as far west as it is possible to go in the United States. Our State is vitally interested in reclamation. The reclamation law was developed under a Republican administration, and it has been with us since 1902.

I happen to be one of those who feel that the House of Representatives made too drastic cuts in the appropriations for the reclamation projects, but I wish respectfully to submit to my able colleagues, the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Montana, that more damage was done to the progress of reclamation in the West by the President's freeze order of last year than has been done by the recent action of the House of Representatives. I wish to call to the attention of the able Senators the fact that when June 30 comes, and when the present fiscal year ends, according to the figures of the Bureau of Reclamation itself, there will be in excess of $56,000,000 of unobligated funds which will be carried over; and the able Senator from Florida will recall that in August of last year the President imposed a freeze order, so that construction could not take place, applying to funds in the amount of more than $85,000,000. That was later modified and increased to $110,000,000, and finally to $130,000,000; and for 1948 the President's freeze order amounted to approximately $177,000,000. So, as a matter of fact, with the amount allowed by the House of Representatives and the amount of the carry-over and with the possible additions which may be made by the Senate, probably sufficient funds will be available to reach the amount of the ceiling which has been placed on the expenditures for reclamation projects by the President of the United States himself.

Therefore I wish to reiterate that I believe more damage has been done to the construction of reclamation projects in the West by the President's freeze order of last year than has been done by the action of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I, too, think the record should be kept straight. The President's freeze order was issued only last August as to reclamation funds which could not be expended at that time. Contracts were not then available, and machinery and materials were not then available. The President lifted the freeze order when work under the contracts could proceed. Then the President, after a long series of hearings and conferences, set a budget figure for this year, after the contracts had been let. The real fact is that after that budget ceiling was fixed on reclamation projects, based upon the advice of the Bureau of Reclamation as to how fast it could progress on certain great projects, such as the Central Valley project and the Columbia Basin project—after that minimum amount had been set, the House, by a yea-and-nay vote, voted to cut the funds for the Columbia Basin project right to the bone.

I hope the Senator from California is correct in assuming that the Senate Appropriations Committee will vote to restore the funds for these items. However, the absolute minimum requested for the Columbia Basin, for instance, which is the greatest reclamation project in the entire world, was $27,000,000, and that was cut to $11,000,000 or $12,000,000. I may have made a mistake of as much as $1,000,000 in stating the amount of the reduction; and, if so, I hope the Chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee will correct me.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will restore that cut.

However, in the hearings in both Appropriations Committees it has been stated that the President's freeze order hurt the reclamation projects. I do not know whether it hurt the projects in the State of Montana, but I know that it did not hurt the projects in the States of Washington and Oregon, because the freeze order simply held the funds for such projects in abeyance until they could be spent in the best possible way; and as soon as the machinery and the materials were available, the funds were released by the President.

The President had no intention of crippling or hurting the reclamation projects in the West in any way at all. He never had that in mind. He said so many times to those of us who are interested in reclamation and who talked to him. But those funds could not be used at that time, when we were coming out of the war and when materials and machinery were not available. However, the moment they became available, the President released the funds.

Let me say that the President has written to the chairmen of the two Appropriations Committees only recently, saying that regardless of what action the Senate takes respecting appropriations for reclamation projects, he has no intention of doing such a thing in 1948 as issuing a freeze order in regard to the funds.

Mr. President, the freeze order did not hurt any reclamation project that I know of. However, the action taken by the House in respect to reclamation projects in the West not only cut the appropriations to the bone but struck the worst body blow at both reclamation and power that has ever been struck in their history.

I repeat that the freeze order did not have anything to do with it. It might have temporarily suspended work on those projects, but all the funds were released in a short time. I think the record should be clear as to that. There may have been some project in California which found itself in a different situation, but certainly that was not the case in respect to the reclamation projects with which I am familiar.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I certainly say that, so far as concerns the development of the great Central Valley project in the State of California, the freeze order was one of the most detrimental things that ever happened to that project. If the Senator will examine the record, I believe he will find that a similar condition exists in the case of many of the other great reclamation projects in the West.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Let me ask the Senator from California how many weeks the freeze order applied to the funds for the Central Valley project.

Mr. KNOWLAND. It applied to them sufficiently long to cause the suspension of operations during the period when the greatest construction could have been expected; in short, during the fall months and the winter months.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I may be mistaken, but I understand that the Bureau of Reclamation has categorically stated that the delay caused by the short period of weeks during which the President's freeze order was applied to certain reclamation and harbor development and flood control funds did not delay those projects at all in their normal progress, because in many cases the work could not have been continued at that time of the year anyway, and the money would not have been used, even if it had been lying there, available to them.

The statement to which I have just referred was made to me, and I think the hearings held by the House Appropriations Committee on the Interior Department appropriation bill will show those statements.

So, Mr. President, I do not think it is quit according to the facts to place the blame for any delay or jeopardy of the western reclamation projects on the President's freeze order.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Florida will yield to me, I will say to the Senator from Washington that what he has just stated is absolutely true insofar as the flood-control projects in Pennsylvania are concerned. As to flood control, we fear that we may be faced with the same drastic cuts, hatchet cuts, that faced the West in the case of reclamation projects. But the freeze order on the flood control funds did not retard the projects in Pennsylvania 1 week or 1 day.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield for one more question?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I merely wish to say to my able colleague from the State of Washington, who comes from one of the Pacific Coast States, as I do, and is vitally interested in reclamation, that if it be true that these reclamation projects could not get the materials, and could not get the equipment, and could not, even if they had their funds, go ahead with construction, then why the necessity for the freeze order at all?

Mr. MAGNUSON. The freeze order, as the Senator well knows, covered a multitude of projects, river and harbor projects, flood control projects, and reclamation projects. I do not know whether power projects were included or not, but it covered all three of those categories. The President was trying to balance the budget, and the Bureau of the Budget advised the President, I understand, that if these funds were lying in the Treasury, they probably would not be used anyway during that period, because some of the projects had to slow up in order to get the heavy materials in; and so the President released the freeze order.

As I recall, the freeze order—I know it was true as to the Columbia Basin—lasted from sometime in August until sometime in October, a period of about 9 weeks. I do not know what was done as to the Central Valley, but that was true as to the Columbia Basin. It did not, however, jeopardize that project one iota, insofar as the chart laid down for it by the Bureau of Reclamation was concerned.

Mr. MURRAY and Mr. WHERRY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield first to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHERRY. I thought I should like to comment upon the last statement made by the Senator from Washington. He said that certainly the freeze order did not prevent the work going on in Central Valley.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I did not say that. I said I did not know about that.

Mr. WHERRY. I understood the Senator to say that.

Mr. MAGNUSON. No, I did not.

Mr. WHERRY. I do not care to get into an argument, as chairman of the subcommittee——

Mr. MAGNUSON. I do not want to get into an argument with the chairman, either, because I want him to see that the funds are restored.

Mr. WHERRY. I guess I will take my seat. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I only wish to say that the Senator from Washington has explained the effect of the freeze orders exactly as we understood them in the State of Montana. The appropriations for the reclamation projects in my State—I refer especially to the Hungry Horse Dam, an irrigation project—were cut from $4,500,000 to $1,500,000. The effect of that cut would be completely to hamstring the construction work on the project, and render it much more expensive in the end. Witnesses who came here from the State of Montana appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and explained the situation completely. I, too, am very hopeful that the chairman of the subcommittee will sympathize with us and see that the appropriation for that project is restored, because it is of great importance to the State of Montana.

Mr. KNOWLAND subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have placed in the RECORD, following the prior discussion on the floor between the able Senator from Washington and the junior Senator from California, relative to the Interior Department appropriation bill, a portion of the House report containing the testimony of Mr. Straus before the subcommittee in the House of Representatives. I merely wish to call to the attention of my able colleague from the State of Washington that in his testimony Mr. Straus, the Commissioner of Reclamation, said that the first and worst blow came August 2, when, because of the freeze order, the Reclamation Bureau was forced to suspend all awards of contracts, and that the order—knocked our carefully engineered and scheduled construction program into a heap. Also, that block held up further awards virtually through the balance of the construction season until snow fell.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. JONES. We shall go back to Mr. Straus' statement on page 11. The statement intrigues me. You say "the first and worst came August 2, when by the direction resulting from what then seemed a very real danger of adding to inflationary pressures so as to retard reconversion and for the purpose of holding back capital outlay, we were suddenly ordered to suspend all awards of contracts."

You go on to say that "knocked our carefully engineered and scheduled construction program into a heap. Also, that block held up further awards virtually through the balance of the construction season until snow fell. It was then lifted but twice, since then there have been other changes, restrictions, or new blocks on what was to have been a clear track."

In no part of that paragraph are you describing congressional action?

Mr. STRAUS. No, sir. I am not. Specifically, what I am referring to was the general freeze order on public-works construction issued applicable to reclamation and other Federal construction on August 2.

Mr. JENSEN. By the President of the United States?

Mr. STRAUS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES. Was the actual order prepared by Reconversion Director Snyder, now Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. STRAUS. There was an order signed by Mr. Steelman, I believe, and the letter from the President presumably prepared by the Budget. Mr. Steelman was then Director of War Mobilization and Reconversion.

Mr. JONES. Then you go on to say that you had the "stop and go" orders and "whoa!" and "giddap!" direction which interfered with the careful planning of the Reclamation Bureau.

That brings me to the status of your funds as of July 1, 1946, which is the beginning of the present 1947 fiscal year. You had unobligated balances from prior years of $110,236,207. Congress added $109,497,108 in 1947, and that made a total available for expenditure in the fiscal year 1947 of $219,733,315; is that correct?

Mr. STRAUS. Yes, sir; that is correct.

Mr. JONES. How much of the program did the Presidential freeze order stop, dollarwise?

Mr. STRAUS. It stopped everything on which a construction contract had not been finally awarded, which was a majority of the program.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, it is obvious, from what has been said by the able Senators, that we all complain about what the House has done, and we all recognize that the Executive freeze order was a temporary executive order, whereas what we are doing here is fix a permanent legislative policy for the country.

Mr. President, passing on to page 25—and I am speaking now, as I said before, only of the changes made in the Senate bill by the committee of conference—in subparagraph (4) on page 25 of the committee print it is provided:

Nothing in this section shall be construed to prohibit the waiving of hearings by stipulation for the purpose of a consent election in conformity with regulations and rules of decision of the Board.

The effect of that is, by implication, to prevent the Board from granting a prehearing election, which, as a practical matter, will delay the functioning of the Board in giving effect to the right of collective bargaining, which the bill professes to give to the workers of the country.

In the next paragraph, subparagraph (5), on the same page, the conference report reads:

In determining whether a unit is appropriate for the purposes specified in subsection (b) the extent to which the employees have organized shall not be controlling.

Let me state the vice of that. Under the present rulings of the Board, and the present law, if in a large department store a group of workers are already organized, they are usually allowed the right of collective bargaining with the employer without having to wait until half the store or all the store becomes organized. The same principle would apply, of course, to a great industrial plant.

Under the language I have read, it will be completely competent for the Board to say, "In spite of the fact that this department store is organized, we are not going to let the workers have collective bargaining rights with the employer." It is just another case of the principle and the privilege of collective bargaining being restricted and hamstrung by the provisions of the bill.

Mr. President, I call attention to that policy, which is contrary to section 9 (b) (1), section 9 (b) (2), and section 9 (b) (3), where the proponents of the bill purport to wish to encourage smaller units as bargaining agencies for workers.

It will be seen, by reference to page 26, that again the Senate bill has been changed. Under the Senate bill it was sufficient for "a substantial number of employees" to apply for the privilege of holding an election to authorize the bargaining agent to enter into a union-shop agreement with the employer. The conferees, instead of permitting a substantial number of employees the right to demand such an election, has required that the election shall be predicated upon the petition of 30 percent, nearly one-third of the workers, who might desire to have an election. It is another case of making it more difficult for the workers to organize, or even to have an election to determine whether they will authorize their bargaining agent to enter into a union-shop agreement.

On page 27 there is the beginning of several provisions, like those found in a subsequent portion of the bill, where all labor rights under the Labor Act are denied or suspended unless the labor organization files numerous reports and affidavits, or their representatives file such reports or affidavits, which are required by the bill.

The list of things they have to include in those reports goes far beyond the requirements upon any corporation in respect to the reports it has to file. For example, one of the provisions is that in such a report they must show where all their money went. That could be construed as meaning that every penny had to be disclosed. A corporation does not have to make such a report. The executive of a corporation can pad his expense account and say that he spent the money for company business. Yet he can give $1,000 to a political candidate—and I know of cases where that has occurred—but no one is going to check up on the corporation. The corporation does not have to show anything more than that they used the money for expenses, but the labor union has to show where every dollar of its money went. It is another discrimination against the workers, and in favor of the employers.

Furthermore, Mr. President, a labor organization—and I am referring now to subparagraph (f) on page 27—cannot affiliate with an international union unless the international union itself has also complied with all the technical conditions and requirements which are set forth in the bill. So it merely makes it more difficult for a national union to affiliate with an international union. Thereby it discourages the organization of workers into larger groups, thereby diminishing the bargaining power of the workers of the land. The same principle is embodied on page 30, in subsection (h).

Now, Mr. President, on page 32 of the conference committee print, the National Labor Relations Board is required to observe the same rules, the same technicalities, that a Federal court is required to observe, in passing on the cases that come before the board. We all know, Mr. President, that from the beginning of judicial history the people have complained about the law's delay. I am a lawyer myself, and I know that a lawyer on the other side can delay a case almost indefinitely, if he takes advantage of all the legal technicalities. That is what corporation lawyers are trained in doing, so that when a labor union claims that it has been unfairly treated, the corporation lawyers take the case to the Board, and, like a case in court, one never knows when a smart corporation lawyer on the other side is going to let the case be set for trial, or when he will let it go to an ultimate decision. We know it has been the policy of administrative agencies to try to simplify their procedure and get rid of many of the delaying technicalities of the regular law courts. Yet, what does the conference committee do? It provides:

Any such proceeding—

That is a proceeding before the board, in the protection of workers' rights—

Any such proceeding shall, so far as practicable, be conducted in accordance with the rules of evidence applicable in the district courts of the United States under the rules of civil procedure for the district courts of the United States, adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States pursuant to the act of June 19, 1934.

So, there again, Mr. President, the ability of the board to expedite its procedure and to get to the merit of a case, rather than to follow the technicalities, is simply made more difficult by the provisions of the conference report.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MURRAY. I should like to ask the Senator if there is not a maxim of law to the effect that "Law delayed is law denied"?

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator is exactly right. The power to delay the case is the power to deny justice to the person seeking it in a court.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Is the Senator familiar with the fact that the Board hearings today are practically all conducted in accordance with the rules of evidence of the district courts?

Mr. PEPPER. Yes.

Mr. TAFT. Is the Senator also familiar with the fact that there is in the conference report an exception, "so far as practicable," which really leaves it largely to the discretion of the Board and the examiners whether they shall apply the rules of evidence or not? As a practical matter, today the rules of evidence of the district courts, adopted by the Supreme Court, are very liberal. They have gotten rid of all the technicalities of past history. As I say, the actual proceedings of the trial examiners are conducted in accordance with the rules of evidence, so that we were really conceding nothing to the House in putting this in, particularly with the modification, "so far as practicable."

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I appreciate that comment of the Senator from Ohio. But if it is what the Board is now doing, why add anything to the statute, as an admonition to them to tighten up what they are now doing? Why not let them alone, if they have been going along practically observing the rules? But the important thing is, they have had the right to relax some of the severe rules whenever they thought it a desirable thing to do. Now, they must read the statute as meaning something to them; and if they obey the law, they, as a practical matter, are going to feel under greater compulsion to apply rigid court rules and technical procedures than to get at the real gist of a case and to ascertain as expeditiously as possible the facts.

Mr. President, what I want to emphasize by mentioning this matter is the cumulative effect of the bill. Just another little facet is being cut closer; just another little screw is being tightened, as a constriction upon the rights and the protections of the workers. The point to which I have just adverted is not large of itself, but it is the cumulative effect of these things that makes the bill, in my opinion, so fatal a blow at the workers of the country.

UNVEILING OF STATUE OF WILLIAM E. BORAH—RECESS

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TAFT. If a recess of the Senate is now to be taken, is the Senate to reconvene immediately following the unveiling of the statue of the late Senator Borah?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order adopted by the Senate yesterday, the Senate will now recess for 1 hour, or until the conclusion of the ceremonies in the rotunda. The Chair will suggest that Senators attending the ceremonies return to the Chamber after the unveiling of the statue. The bells will be rung to indicate the resumption of the session, but the Chair thinks Senators should have as the general objective returning to the Chamber by 3:15. The Senate will not attend the services in a body, but all Senators have been invited by the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. DWORSHAK] to attend the ceremonies in connection with the unveiling yonder, under the dome of the Capitol, of the statue of our late great colleague, William Edgar Borah.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I assume I may continue when the Senate reconvenes, following the ceremonies in the rotunda?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida will have the floor, upon the resumption of the session.

The Senate will now stand in recess.

Thereupon (at 2 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess for 1 hour.

On the expiration of the recess, the Senate reassembled and was called to order by the President pro tempore.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3020) to prescribe fair and equitable rules of conduct to be observed by labor and management in their relations with one another which affect commerce, to protect the rights of individual workers in their relations with labor organizations whose activities affect commerce, to recognize the paramount public interest in labor disputes affecting commerce that endanger the public health, safety, or welfare, and for other purposes.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. RUSSELL. If the Senator will yield, I think a quorum should be present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield for a quorum call?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BALDWIN in the chair). Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, turning to page 34 of the conference committee print, the conference has added the following language to the Senate bill:

> No order of the Board shall require the reinstatement of any individual as an employee who has been suspended or discharged, or the payment to him of any back pay, if such individual was suspended or discharged for cause.

That looks like a very simple and innocent provision. It may seem on its face to be a very proper provision, for it appears only to give the employer the right to discharge a worker for good reason. But this is what the provision does: Under the present law a worker may be discharged by his employer for cause, but the Board may go into the real reasons for the discharge, and if the Board finds that although cause was given as the excuse, the real reason was the fact that the worker was trying to organize a union or trying to join a union, the Board may set aside the act of the employer and require the reinstatement of the worker upon that evidence. But this language allows a worker to be discharged because of union activities, although that may be only a concurrent cause of discharge.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. PEPPER. If the Senator will allow me to finish this statement, so as to make the point clear, I shall then be glad to yield.

In other words, if an employer has been allowing workers to smoke in a prohibited area, if he has been allowing workers to show up late for work, if he has been letting them quit ahead of time at the end of the day, or violate any other rules, yet if a given employee, because he has been engaged in union activities which the employer does not like, is selected out of the crowd and discharged for violating a rule, and no one else is discharged for violating the rule, or if it can be shown that the real motivating reason which caused the employer to fire the worker was his union activities, if cause existed it would be a basis for discharge, and this provision would forbid the Board to reinstate the worker. As a practical matter, that is the effect of that language.

I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. I think the Senator is completely mistaken. That is not all the effect of this language. It merely states the present rule. If a man is discharged for cause, he cannot be reinstated. If he is discharged for union activity, he must be reinstated. In every case it is a question of fact for the Board to determine.

The House language provided that the burden of proof should be on the employee to show that he was not discharged for cause. The Senate conferees took the position that the question was whether he was discharged for cause, and that the burden of proving that cause should be on the employer, because the information is in his hands. So we did not accept the House provision. All this language does is simply to say exactly what the present rule is. If the Board finds that the man was discharged for cause, that is one possible outcome. If it finds that he was discharged for union activity, that is the other outcome. The Board must determine the facts in every case. For years it has had to determine in every case whether a man was discharged for cause or for union activity. In my opinion this language in no way changes the existing provision of law, after the modification which we forced in the House provision.

Mr. PEPPER. Let me comment on what the able Senator from Ohio has said. If it were not intended to change the existing law, why was anything placed in the conference report on the subject?

Mr. TAFT. Let me say why. When we have a conference with the House and the House yields on all the major points, if the House conferees want certain language in, and the language does not do any more than state the existing law, it it a little hard to refuse to put it in. That is why we put it in. For the purpose of the RECORD, I am glad to make that statement, because there is no intention whatever to change the existing law on this particular question.

Mr. PEPPER. I submit the further inquiry, Why did the House put it in?

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. Everyone knows that the House was trying to write the strongest bill it could write. Why did the House put it in if it did not intend to do something to tighten up the present law?

Mr. TAFT. When the House put it in, it wanted to shift the burden of proof to the employee. That is why it was put in.

Mr. PEPPER. Exactly.

Mr. TAFT. We said, "We will accept this language if you will eliminate the other." Naturally the House conferees wanted to show that some of the House language was preserved. In general they accepted the entire basis of the Senate bill and the Senate language. What we did here, in effect, was to say, "If you will modify the language so that it does not change the existing law, we will accept it, and you can point to it as one of the instances in which the House language instead of the Senate language was accepted."

Mr. PEPPER. We have an admission from the Senator from Ohio that the language was intended to mean something. It was intended to shift the burden of proof from the employer to the employee.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Of course, the Senator understands that that part of the House language was taken out.

Mr. PEPPER. Yes. However, I wish to quote from the conference report, and I hope Senators will attend what I am about to quote. I suggest that the result of the conference report is to leave the interpretation of the language exactly as the House intended it. Let us see if that is correct. I read from page 55 of the conference report:

> (10) The House bill also included, in section 10 (c) of the amended act, a provision forbidding the Board to order reinstatement or back pay for any employee who had been suspended or discharged, unless the weight of the evidence showed that the employee was not suspended or discharged for cause. The Senate amendment contained no corresponding provision. The conference agreement omits the "weight of evidence" language, since the Board, under the general provisions of section 10, must act on a preponderance of evidence, and simply provides that no order of the Board shall require reinstatement or back pay for any individual who was suspended or discharged for cause. Thus employees who are discharged or suspended for interfering with other employees at work, whether or not in order to transact union business, or for engaging in activities, whether or not union activities, contrary to shop rules, or for Communist activities, or for other cause (see Wyman-Gordon v. N. L. R. B., 153 Fed. (2) 480), will not be entitled to reinstatement. The effect of this provision is also discussed in connection with the discussion of section 7.

That shows that the Senate conferees agreed to the elimination of the words "weight of evidence," because they do not use those words which are necessary to accomplish the effect which the House sought to achieve. They say that under the rules of the Board itself the Board had to find by a preponderance of the evidence, and therefore there was not any need to put in the words of the House; but they do not disaffirm the purpose of the House, which the Senator from Ohio has acknowledged this afternoon.

What I am saying, Mr. President, is that if an employer has a union employee of whom he wants to get rid, all he has to do is to snoop around and find him violating some rule or regulation or prohibition, and then fire him in spite of the fact that he does not fire anyone else for the same reason; in spite of the fact that the real reason for the discharge of the worker is the fact that the employer dislikes his activities with respect to the union, which may be perfectly legal under the provisions of the bill. There, again, Mr. President, the burden of proof is shifted. In other words, instead of leaving it up to the Board to put the burden of proof on the employer, the burden of proof is put on the employee, which makes it just a little harder for the employee to get the protection that the law was intended to afford.

Again, Mr. President, I remind the Senate that that is only one single provision of the bill, although many of them are iniquitous. It is a cumulative affair. Everywhere we turn there is a dagger or a nail or a spike to be stuck into the body of labor to make it less effective in the future than it has been in the past.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. The conference report does not quite say what the Senator from Florida suggests. The original House provision was that no order of the Board could require the reinstatement of any individual or employee who had been suspended or discharged, unless the weight of the evidence showed that such individual was not suspended or discharged for cause. In other words, it was turned around so as to put the entire burden on the employee to show he was not discharged for cause. Under provision of the conference report, the employer has to make the proof. That is the present rule and the present practice of the Board. The Board will have to determine—and it always has—whether the discharge was for cause or for union activity, and the preponderance of the evidence will determine that question. The mere fact that there may be a little cause or real reason would not in any way lead the Board to refuse to give the employee reinstatement and back pay.

Mr. PEPPER. I do not desire to prolong the argument, because I wish to conclude. I shall have to let the matter stand on the statement of the Senator from Ohio as to the intention of the House in its original bill, what I read from the report of the conferees, and the fact that the language to which I have alluded was put in the bill at all, which certainly was intended to have some effect. Here is the importance of it. It is always a difficult matter to determine the real reason of the employer in discharging a worker. There can always be found some sort of excuse if it is desired to find one. If the employer does not give the worker the benefit of the doubt he can always wait until he smokes a cigarette 3 feet before he gets out of the door, or find some error that would constitute cause. The provision shifts the burden of proof to make the worker show he was discharged for union activities, rather than to make the employer show that the worker was discharged for cause.

Bear in mind, please, this provision in relation to another which I previously discussed. That was the provision in the conference report which denies to the Board the right to consider anything the employer said in advance of the act of discharge which might have any bearing upon his reason for discharge, and keeping such statements out of evidence unless they contain not only a declaration but an actual threat, implied or expressed. Take those two provisions together, and it will be seen that they add many times to the power of the employer to discharge a worker for some reason that may be dissociated from cause or relating entirely to the exercise of the workers' rights under the law.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. I am reminded, by the Senator's statement about how easy it is to discharge an employee, of what I found out in an experience I had in Harlan County, Ky., in 1937, when the workers there were trying to unionize the mines. The mine operators hired a group of thugs and gunmen, and when they did not shoot miners for engaging in union activities, one of the tricks to get rid of a worker was to throw dirt in his coal as it went through the tunnel. They shoveled a little dirt in, and if dirt was found in the coal more than twice the worker was discharged for mining dirty coal.

Mr. PEPPER. That is a good illustration of how a charge can be trumped up, and then the employer can make a sanctimonious protest and say, "We have got to preserve the purity of our coal. Three times dirt was found in the coal of this employee; he is a menace to this plant." All of that statement would not be admissible in evidence, under this bill, which for the first time excludes what an employer may say, although relevant, if his statement does not, in addition, contain an actual threat. It is like making a man prove he is innocent and then denying him the privilege of bringing into court pertinent evidence that might have a relationship to the proof of his cause. It is a little bit more tightening down upon the privileges of labor in America.

Passing on, now, to page 39, in subparagraph (k) the conferees dispense with the necessity of the Board's appointing an arbitrator to try to resolve an industrial dispute, but, on the contrary, provide that they shall take a secret vote of the workers to see whether they will accept the last offer of the employer. That is another discrimination against the worker. Why do they not require that the stockholders of the corporation which is the employer be polled to see whether they agree to the last offer made by the workers? It should work both ways.

Suppose there is a dispute between the United States Steel Corp. and the CIO steel workers, and the President of United States Steel Corp. makes an offer and Phil Murray, on behalf of the workers, makes an offer. Under this bill, if they cannot agree, instead of appointing an arbitrator, as the present law allows, a secret vote of the workers must be taken to see whether they will accept the last offer of the President of the United States Steel Corp. There is not a word about requiring the stockholders of the United States Steel Corp. to accept the last offer of Phil Murray on behalf of the workers. No, they do not have to submit to a secret ballot conducted by the National Labor Relations Board. The workers cannot go behind the management of the steel company, but the Steel Corp., by law, through the National Labor Relations Board, can go behind the workers' representatives and try to get them to agree to something that Phil Murray would not agree to in conference with the management. It is another bit of evidence of discrimination against the workers. Again I remind the Senate that it is the cumulative effect of all these provisions which makes the strictures so severe.

I pass on, Mr. President. In all the respects I am talking about the conference bill is worse than the Senate bill. I am not talking about the vices of the Senate bill.

Mr. President, I read from subsection (b) on page 45:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the execution or application of agreements requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment in any State or Territory in which such execution or application is prohibited by State or Territorial law.

In other words, this Federal law, as it will be, if enacted, and as such under the Constitution, will be controlling, does not liberalize any State law or Territorial law that might be severe upon the worker. It leaves in effect, all the strictures which any State may impose, whereas in the portal-to-portal bill Senators will recall that we provided a uniform statute of limitations made uniform throughout the country.

If labor legislation of this character is good anywhere in America, it is good everywhere in America. We do not discharge our duty to legislate for the Nation if in any instance in which a State has a law which is worse that the Federal law, we allow such State law to remain in effect.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I may be mistaken, but my recollection is that at the time when the portal-to-portal pay bill was in the form in which it left the floor of the Senate, to go to conference, the statement the Senator from Florida has just made was a correct statement; but as the bill has come back from the conference, I believe it does permit a State statute of limitations of less than 2 years to apply. I may be mistaken about that, but that is my recollection.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I merely wish to make it clear that in the report of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare to the Senate, we stated that in our opinion there was nothing in the bill as originally reported by the committee which in anyway would invalidate the provisions of a State law prohibiting the closed shop. That statement appears in the committee report to the Senate, on page 6. In it we pointed out that when the National Labor Relations Act was enacted, it was made clear in the report at that time that the proviso in section 8 (3) was not intended to override State laws regulating the closed shops. At that time the Senate committee stated that the bill did nothing to facilitate closed-shop agreements or to make them legal in any State where they may be illegal.

In other words, the whole spirit of the Wagner Act and its provisions would prohibit a closed shop, because it prohibits discrimination against people who are not members of labor unions. In order to preserve that right and to keep the Wagner Act itself from abolishing the closed shop everywhere, it was necessary to write in this proviso. But that did not in any way prohibit the enforcement of State laws which already prohibited closed shops.

That has been the law ever since that time. It was the law of the Senate bill; and in putting in this express provision from the House bill, we in no way change the bill as passed by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the majority, including the able Senator from Ohio, have been going to great lengths to correct what they regard as some of the discovered deficiencies in the National Labor Relations Act. I agree that the Senator from Ohio is correct in saying that the report at that time—not the Wagner Act itself, in its verdict, but the report—indicated that its authors did not intend that that act should override State laws. But why is it that now the majority try to correct every other alleged defect in the Wagner Act, except when the Wagner Act reserved to the States the right to be more severe than the Federal Government and to apply State standards more severe than the national standard, in the opinion of Congress? Why do not the majority remove that obstruction? Why do they not amend the National Labor Relations Act in that respect, and say, "We are legislating for the United States of America, as the Congress of the United States"?

But, no, Mr. President; when there was something in the Wagner Act which was already restrictive of the rights of labor, they left it there. It is only the generous provisions of the Wagner Act that they have overturned; it is only as to them that they made this measure contradictory of the provisions of the Wagner Act.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. My understanding is that the basis of this legislation, constitutionally speaking, is the commerce clause of the Constitution, authorizing the Federal Government to regulate commerce between the States. Throughout the entire history of such legislation that has been its basis.

This measure does not affect wholly intrastate commerce and persons who are engaged in intrastate commerce, rather than interstate commerce. The provision of the measure which exempts any State from the operation of its provisions, if such State has outlawed the closed shop, therefore in effect adopts the State as the agency through which the regulation of interstate commerce shall take place, insofar as the closed shop is regulated.

Mr. PEPPER. That is exactly correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. So in the States whose legislatures desire to exempt their own interstate companies from the operation of this law, all they need to do is to pass a law outlawing the closed shop. Thus they will affect interstate companies as well as intrastate companies.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator from Kentucky is entirely correct.

Let me point out what the Senator from Ohio has said with respect to the regulation of interstate railroad rates. The Congress is supposed to regulate only interstate rates. The States may, in the exercise of their own power, regulate their own intrastate rates, but they cannot regulate interstate rates. They are limited to what is intrastate. But, as the Senator from Kentucky has clearly pointed out, by this measure the Congress is abdicating to the States the right to determine the rules of conduct respecting interstate commerce insofar as it relates to management-labor relations.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if I may do so without imposing too much on the time of the Senator from Florida, I should like to point out the distinction, namely, that in the States where the legislature has not acted to outlaw all closed shops, both interstate and intrastate, the provisions of this measure may be effective, provided a majority of those eligible to vote—not those voting, but those eligible to vote, which is a new principle in elections——

Mr. PEPPER. That is exactly correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. Decide that there shall be a closed shop in the particular plant. It will not apply even in a State where the workers might want it and might by an overwhelming majority vote for it, provided the legislature has said they cannot have it. All that the legislatures need to do in order to impose a ban against all closed shops throughout the United States is to meet and to say, "We will not have any in this State," and thereby both in interstate commerce and intrastate commerce the closed shop will be banned, and the employees will not even be able by an election to establish a union shop, even though a majority of those voting, rather than a majority of those eligible, vote in favor of having it.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Kentucky, for he has shown again that the effect of the conference report will be, not to try to help labor, but further to restrict the rights of labor.

I should like to add something to what I said a moment ago in respect to the elimination of arbitration. In commenting on the provision on page 39, in paragraph (k), in respect to the requirement that the employees shall take a vote on the last offer of the employer, I should have said that paragraph (c), on page 52, also is relevant to that discussion.

Mr. President, another omission in paragraph (c) on page 52 is as follows: In order to encourage the disputants to arbitrate their differences, the Senate bill provided that as much as $500 could be made available out of the Federal Treasury to pay the expenses of arbitration. That provision was changed and the amount to be allowed was eliminated by the conferees. Evidently they are not trying to encourage arbitration and are not trying to help the arbitrating parties to bear the expenses of that obligation on their part. Instead of the arbitration clause, with the provision that not over $500 be made available, as the Senate provided, the conference report provides that a secret ballot must be taken among the employees on the last offer of the employer. It does not seem to me that that is conducive to the settlement of disputes between management and labor and for the best interests of the workers.

Mr. President, I pass on to page 54, section 206, under the heading "National emergencies." The Senate bill did not contain the words "or a substantial part thereof," in the following provision:

SEC. 206. Whenever in the opinion of the President of the United States, a threatened or actual strike or lockout affecting an entire industry or a substantial part thereof engaged in trade, commerce, transportation, transmission, or communication among the several States or with foreign nations, or engaged in the production of goods for commerce, will, if permitted to occur or to continue, imperil the national health or safety, he may appoint a board of inquiry.

As I have just said, the Senate bill did not contain the words "or a substantial part thereof," as applied to that provision. The Senate bill provided that whenever an entire industry is threatened with a strike or lock-out, the President may appoint a board, which may lead to an application to the Attorney General for an injunction, and to the impairment of the Norris-LaGuardia Act's provisions protecting the workers against government by injunction. But here, again, the conference report is not satisfied with protecting against a strike in a case where an entire industry is affected, but the conference report contains the words "or a substantial part thereof." Who will determine that question, Mr. President? It would not have to be a strike in the entire automobile industry, but it could be a strike against only one of the large manufacturers. A strike affecting any substantial part of such an industry, as construed by the Board or the court, would be sufficient to permit the application of this drastic provision for government procedure by injunction, thus again making it a little easier to evade the provisions of the Norris-LaGuardia Act and to obtain injunctions against workers and to impair their efforts to obtain a better standard of living.

For the purposes of this section, in determining whether any person is acting as an "agent" of another person so as to make such other person responsible for his acts, the question of whether the specific acts performed were actually authorized or subsequently ratified shall not be controlling.

Mr. President, that is exactly the contrary of the language of the Norris-LaGuardia Act. I read from section 106, title 29, United States Code:

No officer or member of any association or organization, and no association or organization participating or interested in a labor dispute, shall be held responsible or liable in any court of the United States for the unlawful acts of individual officers, members, or agents—except upon clear proof of actual participation in, or actual authorization of, such acts, or of ratification of such acts after actual knowledge thereof.

And this is the condition—

Observe how the conference report makes a labor union liable for the action of a worker in a picket line to a suit at law in a Federal court for damages through an injunction.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. All this proviso does is to determine the question whether an agent of a labor union should have applied to him the ordinary common law rule of agency. Why a labor union should not be responsible for its agents, under the same rules of law that make a corporation responsible for its agents, I cannot understand. That is what this does. The section of the Norris-LaGuardia Act read by the Senator has nothing to do with injunctions. It has never been considered until very recently in the carpenters' case. That case apparently led to the conclusion that a man who was clearly an agent under all rules of agency was yet not considered an agent of a labor organization. It was one of those privileges which it was felt was not necessary to be continued for a labor organization.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio fails to take into account the difference between a corporation, which is a corporate body, organized for profit, which has relatively few authoritative spokesmen, who can be well controlled and easily disciplined and directed, and a labor organization, which is simply an aggregation of citizens working together for their common good. He wants to apply to an aggregation of citizens, banded together for their common good and the betterment of the living levels of their families, the same rules applied to a body corporate organized for profit, a person, but not a citizen under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. KILGORE. Is it not the Senator's interpretation of the language he has read that under the wording, even, shall we say, the grievance committee of a local, inasmuch as they are elected to represent the membership of the local, would be treated as agents?

Mr. PEPPER. Certainly.

Mr. KILGORE. There are so many thousands of those that it would be highly dangerous if a provision of this broad scope should be enacted.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator is absolutely correct. When we are dealing with a labor organization that involves hundreds or thousands or tens of thousands of people, a labor union leader has no authoritative right to make all of them toe the line of conduct he may lay down. He is no dictator, with a gestapo at his command, to go forth and snuff out the life of the man who does not do what he tells him to do. Remember, we are dealing with passions that are deep in the hearts of men when they are fighting for their children, and they are not going to read some law book to see that they meticulously observe every direction that may be laid down by their leadership, when they are fighting for their lives. Yet, if one of them gets a little out of line, if one of them impetuously does something he should not do, whether the union ever knew of it or not, whether the union forbade it or not, every dollar can be drained out of the union treasury, in a Federal court, which, for the first time, is given jurisdiction, by the proposed statute, in a matter of which it did not have any jurisdiction before.

I have been pointing out the distinction in the bill against the workers. I can turn back to a section to which I previously adverted, in which the proponents of the bill were dealing with the question of agents, and were attempting to amend the law in favor of the corporations.

If someone had the interest of the employer at heart, and was acting on behalf of the employer, and did a wrong to a worker—and I am speaking of subsection 2 on page 6 of the committee print—the case would fall under this language:

The term "employer" includes any person acting as an agent of an employer, directly or indirectly.

Under the present law, it is not necessary to have a directly authorized agent of a corporation to bind it if a wrong is done to a worker. If a trade association acted in the interest and with the point of view of the employer, the employer, therefore, might have been responsible for a large number of acts of people acting in his interest, against workers; but now the conferees carefully prune that; they carefully limit the employer's liability to the acts of a duly authorized agent; but when it comes to the worker they have enlarged, not restricted, the group who may make the treasury of the union liable in suits by corporation lawyers, for instance, in the courts of this land.

As I have said, under that language they have gone directly contrary to the Norris-LaGuardia Act, which provided that a union could not be held responsible "for the unlawful acts of individual officers, members, or agents, except upon clear proof of actual participation in, or actual authorization of, such acts, or of ratification of such acts after actual knowledge thereof."

That is the present law. The Senate bill did not impair that, but the conference report has gone just the reverse of that, and has provided, as I have read, and I shall read it again:

For the purposes of this section—

This is, the section authorizing suits in the Federal courts against labor organizations, with the right of recovery against their treasuries, all their dues, all their assets—

For the purposes of this section, in determining whether any person is acting as an "agent" of another person so as to make such other person responsible for his acts, the question of whether the specific acts performed were actually authorized or subsequently ratified shall not be controlling.

Mr. President, I merely emphasize that a man who may be in a picket line is still a citizen, as well as a member of a labor organization. He is subject to arrest and individual punishment for violation of the law. But what the conferees are looking for is a way to drain dry the union treasury, not only to put the worker in jail for what he did personally, or sue him personally for what he did, if it was wrong, but they want to authorize vexatious suits against the labor-organization treasury, because if the organization has not any money in its treasury it cannot effectively help the workers. It cannot participate in strikes, and the worker therefore cannot strike, and will have to take what he can get for his labor.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. KILGORE. A parallel of that case might be drawn with reference to corporations. What the Senator has in mind is action aimed at the central treasury of the particular national organization, not at the local involved. In other words, an agent of one local might be liable for damages, but the suit would be not against the local, but against the national or international organization, as the case might be. Is that the Senator's interpretation?

Mr. PEPPER. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. KILGORE. Let us draw a parallel with a corporation. Let us take a corporation such as General Motors. Let us suppose an agent of one of their subsidiary corporations should involve the subsidiary corporation in a damage suit. Under the laws of the United States of America no suit could lie against General Motors, the parent corporation, but only against the subsidiary corporation.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KILGORE. But the language of the report goes beyond that; it extends beyond the small organization which caused the damages, and goes back to the parent organization. Is that the Senator's opinion?

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator is absolutely correct. Taking, for example, the United States Steel Corp., which has a great number of subsidiaries, that corporation cannot be sued for something done by one of its subsidiaries; but under the conference report an international union can be sued for something done by one of its local union representatives.

Now, passing on to page 64, this provision in the conference report relating to welfare funds is also new:

(g) Compliance with the restrictions contained in subsection (c) (5) (B) upon contributions to trust funds, otherwise lawful, shall not be applicable to contributions to such trust funds established by collective agreement prior to January 1, 1946, nor shall subsection (c) (5) (A) be construed as prohibiting contributions to such trust funds if prior to January 1, 1947, such funds contained provisions for pooled vacation benefits.

Here is the anomaly of that provision: At the present time hundreds of thousands of workers belong to unions which have welfare funds obtained in collective-bargaining agreements with employers. The funds are working very satisfactory; there is no complaint about the way they work. They are administered by the unions; that is, by the employees; because they were for the benefit of the employees, and they do not have the feeling that the employer is interfering in these matters. Mind you, Mr. President, every time they obtained those funds they were obtained by collective-bargaining agreement formally entered into between employer and employees. But now all new welfare funds are outlawed unless they are in accordance with the new and strict provisions of this proposed act, and unless the employer, and, in the case of a disagreement, a public representative, is allowed to participate in the administration of the funds.

What certain Senators suggested here last year, Mr. President, when this subject was under consideration, was, the writing of a provision, encouraging welfare funds. The workers who become mangled and maimed, the workers who are killed and who leave dependents unprovided for, the workers who become sick and are unable to obtain adequate care, who need assistance but cannot obtain it—all these should be aided by a declaration of purpose on the part of Congress in favor of welfare funds. Instead of suggesting "let us have more of welfare funds, until a national health insurance act is passed sometime in the future," here, again, is another stone hung around the neck of the workers who are striving to provide for their security and to promote their welfare.

Mr. President, I now pass on to the subject we discussed here yesterday, namely, restrictions on political contributions. I am almost disposed to designate that section as the "political insurance section of the Republican Party," because it looks a little as if the Republicans, who are claiming the authorship of this legislation, would like very much to be protected against the circulation by the labor unions of materal and information crediting them with the responsibility for this legislation. If this is good legislation, I should think the widest disseminaton of knowledge about it would be in the public interest; yet, as the Senator from Ohio advised us yesterday, the railway labor executives at the present time, publishing, with their money, a newspaper called Labor, accustomed to put out a special edition of that newspaper, if they want to, in a political campaign could not put out such a paper, because it would be an expenditure which is prohibited under the provision of this section. Now, I want to read section 313:

It is unlawful for any national bank, or any corporation organized by authority of any law of Congress, to make a contribution—

Such contribution was forbidden by the Senate bill, but the conferees have added the words all the way through in this section—or expenditure—

in connection with any election to any political office, or in connection with any primary election or political convention or caucus held to select candidates for any political office, or for any corporation whatever, or any labor organization to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election at which Presidential and Vice Presidential electors or a Senator or Representative in, or a Delegate or Resident Commissioner to Congress are to be voted for, or in connection with any primary election or political convention or caucus held to select candidates for any of the foregoing offices, or for any candidate, political committee, or other person to accept or receive any contribution prohibited by this section.

Furthermore, the Senator from Ohio said yesterday that Mr. William Green could not go on the radio if he wanted to, next year in the presidential election, if the able Senator from Ohio should be the Republican nominee, and President Truman who, I hope, will veto this bill—should be the Democratic nominee, and say "I call on the workers of America to vote for the Democrats, because they are friends of labor." Under section 313 he could be put in jail if he tried to do that. Not only that, but the Senator from Ohio said yesterday that he could not print and disseminate among his friends a pamphlet telling them to vote for Democrats. Oh, no; he could not use any union dues in that way.

Again, Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio is considering a group of citizens banded together for their common benefit as he would consider a corporation created for profit, and he is treating the person who is a citizen like the heartless corporation that may sometimes be considered a synthetic person. So it is rather striking that the Republicans think no higher of a citizen than they do of a corporation, in respect of his rights and privileges.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I want to point out again that this is word for word the bill recommended by the Democratic Committee on Campaign Expenditures, which examined the campaign expenditures last year, headed by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, with the distinguished Senator, I think, from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and one other Democratic Senator, besides the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK].

Mr. ELLENDER. And the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK].

Mr. TAFT. And the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK]. They recommended exactly this provision in a separate bill now pending before the Senate, so that it can hardly be said to be of purely Republican origin.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the Senator, I think, can hardly mean that. I want to call his attention to a difference. The Democratic recommendation did not contain the words "or expenditure."

Mr. TAFT. Yes; I think it did.

Mr. PEPPER. No. I ask the Senator from Louisiana. Did it contain the words "or expenditure"?

Mr. TAFT. In our bill; yes.

Mr. PEPPER. No; but the present law does not contain them.

Mr. ELLENDER. The present law does not contain those words.

Mr. PEPPER. It did not contain them?

Mr. ELLENDER. That is correct. But the bill I introduced on behalf of myself and the distinguished Senators from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK], New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], and Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] contains language identical to the language that appears in the pending bill. It is verbatim, as a matter of fact. Permit me to further observe that the language is the same as that now incorporated in the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925, with the exception that the words "or expenditures" have been added and also language to cover primary elections, conventions, and caucuses has been added.

Mr. PEPPER. There may be just a few erring Democrats, but we never did pass that law. The Senator might have recommended it, but it was never enacted into law.

Mr. ELLENDER. The bill is now before the Rules and Administration Committee of the Senate and I think it will pass the Senate, if and when it is reported for Senate consideration.

Mr. PEPPER. But it never became a law?

Mr. ELLENDER. No. The Senator is correct.

Mr. PEPPER. Yes; and the difference is very important. It affects the right of the citizen to go forth and advocate the candidacy of whomever he may choose.

Mr. ELLENDER. May I say to the Senator from Florida it is only in the event that union funds are used for political contributions that a union becomes liable. Mr. Green can talk all he wants to, if he pays for his own time or if the members of the union desire to make individual contributions for such a purpose. For another thing, most unions operate and manage newspapers, and the most of them are maintained by advertisements or by subscriptions from members of the union and from other sources. The proceeds from such newspapers are not union funds. In such cases these newspapers can print anything they desire, and they will not violate the law, so long as union funds are not used to pay for the operation of those newspapers for political purposes.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator from Ohio apparently did not think so yesterday when the Senator from Washington was interrogating him.

Mr. ELLENDER. I do not recall. May I say to the Senator from Florida, it is only in case union funds are used for political expenditures that unions become liable. That is where the prohibition comes into play.

Mr. PEPPER. Very well. Let us see if the statute says anything about dues. It says the criteria are, first, a labor organization; second, an expenditure. It does not say whether they have to be dues or funds they received from advertising. I should like the Senator to point out the word "dues" to me in the section I have just read—section 315.

Mr. ELLENDER. I did not mention dues. I referred to union funds. If the newspaper is owned by the labor organization and maintained by union funds there would be a violation if the proceeds of such a newspaper were used for political purposes.

Mr. PEPPER. There is nothing about dues in this section.

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator is correct. I never made such a contention. It would be an expenditure by the newspaper itself. This provision makes prohibition against the use of dues paid by members of labor unions in order to aid any particular candidate. In other words, if the dues are paid to the union and become a part of the union's assets, then such dues cannot be used for political contributions.

Mr. PEPPER. The best way to clarify the matter is to read the language:

> It shall be unlawful for any * * * labor organization to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election for any political office.

Mr. ELLENDER. Where does the labor organization obtain the money which it spends for such purpose? If it obtains it from its members and such funds become a part of the union's assets, then they cannot be used for political purposes unless the law is violated.

Mr. PEPPER. How does the labor organization obtain the money? The organization may get it from one source or another. It may get it through gifts, subscriptions, or in other ways except by dues. That is not the point in this measure. The point here is that the money belongs to the union, and the union spends it regardless of where it obtains the money. If one of its members contributed money to the union for the purpose of paying for a radio speech in behalf of a political candidate or of a political party, and the union spent the money for that purpose it would be subject to the criminal penalty provided in this section.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. KILGORE. Is it not the experience of the Senator from Florida with reference to union publications such as those put out by the railroad brotherhoods, Labor, and others, that the publications are not paid for by the members through subscription, but the publications are sent to the members because a part of their dues pay for the publications? In other words, in most cases the publications are mailed free by the organizations to the members of the union, because of the fact that they are dues-paying members.

Mr. PEPPER. Their dues go into a common fund; yes.

Mr. President, the bill presents an anomolous situation. I think it denies the right of free press. I think if a labor union, as an unincorporated association of citizens, wants to endorse a political candidate, if it wants to put out special issues of its newspaper to appeal to the American people to vote for the candidate, the union should have the right to do so, and a denial of that right is a denial of a constitutional right of which Congress cannot deprive anyone.

The union is not a corporation. A corporation does not have the right of the citizen to vote. Citizens have the right to vote. If a group of citizens should want to pay dues to their union and say to its president, "Use this money to pay someone to speak for us, to protect labor against this calumny" the provision of the bill would deny that privilege. I claim that is a denial of the right of a citizen to give his money to a common fund to protect his political and economic rights.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. KILGORE. I should like to suggest another parallel case to the Senator. The Senator knows that subscribers to newspapers do not always agree with the political expressions contained in their editorial columns. The Senator has spoken of the freedom of the press. I agree with the Senator's statement in that respect. It is contended that a labor union cannot use the dues of its membership for political purposes unless 100 percent of the membership should endorse the use that is proposed to be made of the fund. Would it not be just as fair to say that a newspaper should not publish an editorial expressing its views on a political subject unless 100 percent of the subscribers to the newspaper endorse the editorial?

Mr. PEPPER. That is certainly a fair parallel. I will go further than that. I do not want to impugn anyone's personal motives in any sense of the word, but I say that since labor, since the working people of this country, became articulate under the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt, since they learned to work together to meet the danger and menace of slush funds which corporations can find a way to put into the hands of a favorite, there has been a determined effort on the part of certain individuals in Congress, as well as outside, to strike down the power of workers acting cooperatively through their unions. I cannot but regard the provision in the bill to which I am addressing myself as an expression of that sentiment. It has the effect of stifling and suppressing the legitimate political activity of a substantial part of the citizenry of America.

Mr. President, there are 15,000,000 labor union members in America. If there are four members to each family, which is the average American family, these union members are the spokesmen and the bread winners for 60,000,000 Americans. So, to do anything which will impair their right as citizens to write and to speak their views about their Government is a denial not only of labor's rights, but a denial of the fundamental constitutional right of the citizenry of this land.

The laboring people are poor people. They do not have in their membership rich stockholders, rich directors, rich executives. They pay decent salaries to their leaders, and I think they should. I think a few of the top labor leaders may get more than $25,000 a year. Probably not more than a dozen or say two dozen receive more than that amount. But I am saying that they are representatives of workers and that the membership of the union is composed of workers. They do not have large expense accounts which they can pad and use in political campaigns. They do not own the newspapers of America as, by and large, corporations do, 80 percent of which consistently fought Franklin D. Roosevelt. They cannot work through corporate machinery and exercise its many and multitudinous pressures to achieve their ends. If they do anything they have got to work together through the instrumentality by which alone they can cooperate, their unions, and if that power can be struck down, the political manifestations of the masses of the people of American can be strangled, and when they are taken advantage of, they will be unable to protest effectively in the political forum.

I have said that under this provision of the bill they could not put out a special edition of the union newspaper. I am not at all sure—and there was some question about it yesterday when the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] interrogated the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT]—I am not at all sure that a labor newspaper can give a political endorsement to a candidate without violating the stringent provision of the bill and at least subjecting themselves to suits or to criminal prosecution. They cannot have radio speeches paid for out of union funds for union purposes. They cannot even exhibit information to their members that might be in the nature of a pamphlet. That was stated yesterday in the debate. To deny them the right to give their honest views about candidates to their members, and use their common funds with which to do so, seems to me a dangerous strangulation of civil rights of the citizenry of America.

It was said yesterday that these prohibitions apply to the Association of Manufacturers; that they will apply, for example, in my State to the Associated Industries, which denounced me in about every other pamphlet it sent out to its membership, paid for by corporate contributions to that association. But believe me, that organization will find ways to avoid the penalties of this provision. The corporate contributions in this country will not be checked or strangled. And they are not trying to clean up the politics of America, either.

A study of some of the past presidential elections will disclose how much the du Ponts contributed to the Republican campaigns, how much the General Motors Corp., President Sloan and others, contributed, and how much Joe Pew and his association contributed. Such a study will reveal how much the Rockefellers and the great rich families of America who own the corporations of America or dominate them, contributed. Oh, they will still have a full war chest to contribute to the Grand Old Party when election time comes, Mr. President. Of course, it will cost them a little less if the workers are strangled so they cannot put up some contributions. The large contributors will gain a little from the enactment of this provision.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. KILGORE. May I suggest that the Senator from Florida go one step further and discuss the question of the annual bonuses paid out in election years to directors and high-ranking officials of corporations. Every one knows the way they get around the prohibition against corporate contributions, by simply declaring bonuses to certain officials, which can be used for political purposes. That loophole has not been closed, I may suggest to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. Chess is a fairly complicated game, but there will never be on any chess board as many means by which to attain an objective as there are corporate devices by which to achieve the objective the Senator from West Virginia has spoken of.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield. I hope it will be a friendly question.

Mr. BREWSTER. I am a little puzzled by the logic of the other side of the aisle, particularly by the statement of the able Senator from Florida concerning the question of corporate contributions and the corporate situation, because it was 2 years ago that the excess-profits tax on corporations was repealed by a Democratic administration under the leadership of the distinguished minority leader of the present day, then the majority leader, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. We took a tax burden of between $3,000,000,000 and $4,000,000,000 off the backs of the very wicked corporations. That was done by a Democratic administration. The bill was signed by the present incumbent of the White House. It was done at a time when we had a budgetary deficit estimated at $30,000,000,000. Now when it is proposed that we should lift a little of the burden off the backs of individuals—64 percent of the $3,000,000,000 reduction being for people with incomes under $5,000—there is the most determined opposition to such a proposal.

If 2 years ago corporations should have been relieved of between $3,000,000,000 and $4,000,000,000 in taxes by a Democratic administration headed by a Democratic President, why is it that it is now being urged by vociferous voices from the other side of the aisle that the President should veto a measure allowing individuals some measure of relief, when the budget is balanced, and when we have reduced our debt by $20,000,000,000 from its peak at that time? Why is it that such a measure should even be questioned?

Mr. PEPPER. I will say to the Senator that it is barely possible that the Democrats, by association with Republicans, fell into Republican error. That is one thing.

Mr. BREWSTER. Am I to understand that they are going to extricate themselves from that error by refusing relief to individual income taxpayers, after having presented the corporations with $4,000,000,000?

Mr. PEPPER. No; but they are not going to help the Republicans make the situation any worse. That is exactly what the Republican tax bill does.

Mr. BREWSTER. Am I to understand the Senator to say that a President of the United States who relieved corporations of $4,000,000,000 in taxes will veto a measure to give $3,000,000,000 relief to the little fellows?

Mr. PEPPER. I profoundly hope he will, and I believe he will.

Mr. BREWSTER. I think the Senator has a very inaccurate estimate of the consistency of the President. I fully hope and expect, from my knowledge of the gentleman here and elsewhere, that he will follow his hand through, and give the same relief to the little people of the country that the Senate, when it was under Democratic control, and with his full collaboration, gave to the great corporations of the country. I cannot conceive of a President with his record of consistency taking such a course as that proposed by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. I wonder if the Senator from Maine would really want to submit to a fair jury the issue of who is the better friend of the people—the Republican Party or the President of the United States. I think that all one would need to do would be to take the record of the President of the United States and the record of the Republican Party, and the jury, without leaving the box, would render a verdict in favor of President Harry Truman.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I had supposed that the Republican Party submitted this question to the jury of the American people last November, and that they returned a rather decisive answer upon the question of whether they had confidence in the Democratic administration of our affairs.

Mr. PEPPER. I think the Senator from Maine is stretching the issue which was submitted to the people. It will be an issue in the next election, but it was not so clear in the last election. I can imagine the Senator from Maine standing before his constituents at that time advocating the election of the Republican nominee, and saying, "Fellow Americans, if you will elect us Republicans, if there is any man in this crowd who makes $1,200 a year, and now has $1,162 left, he will have left $11 more when the Republicans get in and pass their tax bill. His percentage of spendable income is going to be increased by 1 percent. But if there is anyone in this crowd who makes $100,000 a year, and who now has $36,000 left after taxes, he is going to have $48,716 left, or $11,844 more than he will have left if the Democrats stay in. He will receive a percentage increase of expendable income of 34.2 percent." Just imagine the applause of the masses.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I think if I were to couple with that statement the statement that "if you elect the Democrats you may expect that they will continue the happy record they have made of relieving the great corporations of this country," the result might be a little different. As the Senator from Florida has so effectively pointed out, 60 corporations combine a great deal of economic power. The corporations were relieved of $4,000,000,000 in taxes. That is the record of the Democratic Party in the matter of tax reduction. The little fellow of whom the Senator speaks did not get very much. He got 5 percent, not 30 percent. He got $2 instead of $11. The people of Maine are hardy people, and they know the difference between $2 and $11. Two dollars is all the Democrats gave to the poor little fellow.

Mr. PEPPER. Did the Senator from Maine vote for that bill?

Mr. BREWSTER. I assuredly did.

Mr. PEPPER. Then I would not complain about it so badly.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. What I am complaining about——

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator does not intend to denounce the Democrats for being temporarily in agreement with the Republicans on the question of tax reduction, does he? Did the Republicans oppose the bill?

Mr. BREWSTER. No. The Republicans supported the bill; and the Republicans are supporting the bill to give the little man some relief, which the Senator from Florida is opposing. I am sure that the people of Maine are intelligent enough to understand the distinction.

Mr. PEPPER. Yes; the masses of the people are intelligent enough to understand the distinction between $11 and $11,000.

Mr. BREWSTER. The difference is between $11 and $2. That is what the Democrats gave the little fellows. We now propose to give them $11, and the Senator makes the heavens ring as he proclaims that no President should sign such a bill. I have more confidence in our President than has the Senator.

Mr. PEPPER. I know that the Senator from Maine is a real friend of the Democratic President. I know that he will support him next year. But, Mr. President, this is what I wish to emphasize seriously: I am not proud of the repeal of the excess-profits tax, but I will say that that was the repeal of a wartime levy. I am not a member of the Finance Committee. I am certainly not the chairman of it. If the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] were present, he could speak for himself on that question. But that measure was for the relief of super war taxes imposed upon excess profits. The President is not recommending any more tax reductions for the rich. If excessive relief was granted during that time, at least the President of the United States is not proposing to take off more. Yet, consider what the Republican bill does——

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I shall be glad to yield in a moment.

Under the present law—after President Truman's bill, if the Senator wishes to designate the President as the author of it—under the present law, which was enacted by a Democratic administration, if a man is making $300,000 a year, he has only $65,435 left. There was still a great burden of taxation left on the rich after President Truman's so-called excess profits tax bill was enacted.

This is what the Republicans would do: Under their bill, the man who is now making $300,000 a year, instead of having $65,000 left, would have $102,995 left, or an increase of $37,559, a percentage increase of 57.4. President Truman is not recommending that we give a man with such an income an increase of 57.4 percent in what he has left.

Mr. KILGORE and Mr. MILLIKIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield first to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I am not defending the repeal of the excess-profits tax of 90 percent at the time it was repealed. But I ask the Senator if it is not a fact that it was originally imposed in order to recover excessive profits paid by the Government, because the Government was the largest purchaser in the United States. It was repealed when the Government ceased to be the largest purchaser. That was the basic ground urged upon the Senate and the President for its repeal at that time. At that time the Government was not recouping its own money, and hesitated to penalize taxpayers in that category by taking money coming from other sources.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the Senator for his valuable contribution.

I now yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I think the Senator made the point a while ago as to what is left of a man's income after the Government takes its share in taxes.

Mr. PEPPER. Yes; that is what he spends.

Mr. MILLIKIN. So the point is the percentage of spendable income he has left after he pays his taxes.

Under the bill which is before the President, the man with an income of $1,500 will have 95.57 percent of his income left. The man with an income of $3,000 will have 90.88 percent; the man with an income of $10,000 will have 80.52 percent. The man with an income of $30,000 will have 68.08 percent. The man with an income of $100,000 will have 48.72 percent left, and so forth, until, when we reach the higher brackets, about which the Senator has been speaking, where the taxpayer is left with 23 percent of what he had before taxes.

Let me give the Senator another statistic or two in this matter. Out of an estimated total taxable income for 1947 of $121,000,000,000, 80 percent is received by persons with net incomes of $5,000 or less. Those persons pay 56.8 percent of the taxes under the present law and under the bill which is before the President they would receive 64 percent of the total reduction.

Mr. PEPPER. Under the two proposals of the Senator from Illinois to raise exemptions and to lower surtaxes, 80 percent of the $2,900,000,000 reduction would be received by those with incomes under $5,000 a year and 20 percent to those with incomes above this amount. Under the Republican proposal, 64 percent would go to those with net incomes under $5,000. Here is the tragedy of the present tax policy: I have not now all the figures before me, but it comes down to this: In 1939 the exemption for a married man was $2,500 and for a single person $1,000—$400 was allowed for each dependent. At that time there were only 5,000,000 taxpayers. In the war years, in our desire to try to pay for the terrific cost of the war, we lowered income-tax exemptions. That is, we brought some 47,000,000 people into the category of income-tax payers. That included not only the rich, but the masses of the American people earning $1,000 to $1,200. In the past several years we have imposed certain excise taxes. My figures from the Treasury show that about 80 percent of all the excise taxes—really sales taxes—are paid by people receiving an income of less than $5,000 a year. Let me say what I think the situation is at the present time. The small taxpayer is kept substantially on a wartime basis because his exemptions are not increased, whereas the large taxpayer is carried back nearer to the 1939 base than is the small taxpayer. The way it workers out is this: When we started off with the income tax we allowed an exemption of approximately $2,500, as I recall, to the family. The reason we allowed the family head that exemption was because we knew it required that much for him and his family to live. Before being generous we were trying to be just. But because of the necessity of the Government having more money, we kept pressing those levels down until at the height of the war we lowered the exemptions to such a point that approximately 47,000,000 people were brought into the category of income-tax payers. For a man with an income of $5,000 the gap between the 1939 rates and those in the proposed bill was reduced by about 3 percent—those with incomes of $100,000 about 13 percent.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I shall yield in a minute.

What we have done, therefore, is to put the large taxpayer substantially back to his status in 1939, whereas we have left the little taxpayer substantially on the wartime level.

I now yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not want to prolong this discussion of the tax bill, which is wholly irrelevant to the discussion of the labor bill, but it has been injected. I think it should be noted with reference to the bill in question that the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER], who says he voted for the bill, claims that it relieved 12,000,000 taxpayers of paying taxes altogether last year and brought about a 5-percent reduction to everyone else. So it was not a bill which was simply in the interest of corporations, because it took 12,000,000 taxpayers off the rolls and reduced individual taxes by 5 percent. That was one of the things we did in that act.

I think the committee was unanimous reporting the bill to the floor of the Senate. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] was chairman of the committee. It was recognized that it was the proper thing to do. There were some scattered objections to it on the ground that it relieved some corporations of excess-profits taxes; but what we were trying to do was to bring about some relief from the war taxes which had been imposed in the interests of the resumption of production for peacetime economy. So that it is not true to say that that bill was wholly in relationship to relief of corporations anymore than it was to the 12,000,000 persons in the lower brackets who escaped altogether. There are now 47,800,000 taxpayers after the reduction of the list by 12,000,000 last year. They got an individual relief of 5 percent by an amendment which I myself offered in the Committee on Finance, and it was adopted by the two Houses.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the Senator from Kentucky for his contribution.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I believe the fallacy of the Senator's line of reasoning is this: From the figures which I cited to him the great bulk of the revenue of this country comes from people in the lower income tax brackets. If we abandon those brackets prior to the time we substantially reduce expenditures of the Government, we cannot get sufficient revenue. The Senator has mentioned the injustices of the excise tax system. There are many of them, and they will have to be corrected. If we took the income taxes off the lower brackets we could not put an equivalent amount on the higher brackets, because it is not there. You can confiscate completely the income of the so-called wealthy and not meet your revenue needs. We would be driven to the very thing about which the Senator is complaining. We would have to increase excise taxes; and, as the Senator says, the people in the lower brackets would have to pay the larger burden of them.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I realize that it is difficult to write any tax law. I do not think we should prolong this discussion, but I think that before we start for example, giving $11,000 to a man making $100,000 a year, we certainly should give more to the man at the bottom of the ladder. The Senator has emphasized that we give a 30 percent reduction to the fellow down in the thousand-dollar class, and we give but a ten percent reduction to the fellow in the $300,000 class. But 30 percent of $1,000 is $300, while 10 percent of $300,000 is $30,000.

So what I am saying is that until we can lift the family of the man in the lowest bracket up to a decent level we ought not to raise another man's standard of luxury.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I think there are tests that go fairly to the problem. One is what is left after the tax is paid. Another is how many days a week, how many hours a week, does the taxpayer who is not a Federal employee work for the Federal Government? The gentleman about whom the Senator was talking works probably two weeks a year for the Federal Government. The men in the high brackets are working from 3 to 6 days a week for the Federal Government. That gives a pretty good measure of the fairness of the tax.

Mr. PEPPER. Yes; but what I am saying is that the man in the higher brackets can afford to work longer, because, to use the Senator's illustration, he can work enough in one day to keep his family, but the poor fellow needs all his time, and then he cannot keep his family on the level which we would like to see in this country.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The end result of the Senator's argument is to take all taxes off the lower brackets, and the end result of that is a duplication in this country of what they are experiencing in Great Britain at this time. That has all been tried and it has ignominiously failed.

Mr. PEPPER. There is something in the doctrine of incentive taxation. I do not want to confiscate all the wealth or income of the man who is making $300,000 a year; but if we go back to the level of 1939 it will be seen that there is not much difference in what he will pay under this Republican bill and what he paid in 1939. In other words, he is merely back to prewar status, but the little fellow is still in a bad situation.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. I am afraid the Senator did himself a great injustice in his suggestion that there is a reduction of $300 on a $1,000 income.

Mr. PEPPER. I was simply putting a hypothetical case. Thirty percent of $1,000 is $300, and 10 percent of $300,000 is $30,000. The percentage of reduction is not the criterion of what is left to the taxpayer.

Mr. BREWSTER. Neither of those have any application to the income, if this is a question of taxes.

Mr. PEPPER. No; I am just suggesting it.

Mr. BREWSTER. That gets down to the $11 and the $2.

I appreciate the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky that some reduction was accorded individuals. I think the figures were between $3,000,000,000 and $4,000,000,000 for corporations, and approximately $2,000,000,000 for the individual income tax brackets, with, I think, the 5-percent reduction.

But I am still puzzled—and I wish to speak with as much moderation as the Senator from Kentucky did—by the statement that the Senator has followed through consistently in supporting tax reduction insofar as that can be done consistently with our present fiscal condition. Of course, the Senator from Kentucky is the one who was responsible for a statement to the Tammany Society of New York, during the campaign just preceding the Democratic National Convention in 1944, that following the war there would be a tax reduction of 50 percent.

Mr. PEPPER. Who said that?

Mr. BREWSTER. The Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, that is the third or fourth time the Senator from Maine has quoted me as having made that statement. I made no such statement as that.

I did make a statement, not only to the Tammany Society—the name of which the Senator from Maine seems to enjoy rolling around on his tongue as if it were a sweet morsel—but also to many commercial clubs, boards of trade, and other groups, that, after the war was over and after we had discharged the hang-over obligations arising as a result of the war, I hoped we could reduce the expenditures of this Government to somewhere between $22,000,000,000 and $25,000,000,000; and that if we could do that, we could bring about a very substantial reduction in taxes, and probably in some brackets a 50-percent reduction.

But I never at any time said we could reduce all taxes 50 percent. I never said we would do it; and even what I said about reducing governmental expenditures was a fervent hope which we have not yet realized.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President will the Senator further yield to me?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I do not recall that this matter has been mentioned on the floor of the Senate more than once before, when I read part of a clipping from the New York Times in which the Senator from Kentucky was quoted in that way. I do not recall that at that time the Senator from Kentucky questioned the accuracy of the quotation. If he had, I would not have repeated it here.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know whether I was in the Chamber when that statement was made.

Mr. BREWSTER. The Senator from Kentucky was in the Chamber at that time.

Mr. BARKLEY. But I am now repeating a statement which I made 3 or 4 years ago, before the war ended, as to what I hoped we would be able to do after the war ended. We may not be able to do it yet. Of course, many times we express hopes that cannot be realized.

Mr. BREWSTER. Does the Senator from Kentucky say that the quotation was inaccurate?

Mr. BARKLEY. I have not seen it yet. I assume that the Senator from Maine accurately quoted it. But if the article indicated that I promised that taxes would be reduced 50 percent after the war ended, it certainly would be inaccurate.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I wish to add to my discussion of section 313 that this measure provides a criminal penalty for any persons who violate the provisions of that section, which prohibits the making of an expenditure in connection with a political campaign. That would simply mean that, in a campaign, if the workers tried to take any collective or organized part in support of a candidate or a party, they could be subjected to constant criminal harassment, under the loose language of this section.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from Florida will recall that earlier this afternoon he and I had a little discussion about the portal-to-portal-pay bill. I have checked into the provisions of the bill. I wish to say, in the interest of the accuracy of the RECORD, that the statement the Senator from Florida made was correct, namely, that that bill, as it came back from the conference, provides for a uniform 2-year statute of limitations.

I knew there was some reference to exceptions in certain circumstances in State cases. In checking into it, I find that the provisions as to State cases relate to cases now pending, but filed within 120 days after the enactment of the bill. As to such cases, the existing State statute will apply. But except as to those cases, the 2-year statute of limitations is uniform.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Oregon for his usual thoroughness in clearing up that matter.

I have adverted to instances in which the Senate bill has been made worse. I shall not present a detailed discussion of the Senate bill, except I wish to remind the Senate that it outlaws the closed shop. Today a substantial proportion of the workers in the United States who are working under collective-bargaining agreements are employed in closed shops; but if this measure becomes law that will be outlawed.

Under this measure there can be only a kind of union shop, and then only under a more onerous condition than that which applied before, namely, the bargaining agent must be authorized by a majority of the members of the union and must be selected specifically by a majority of those eligible to vote—not simply by a majority of those who take part in the election—thereby outlawing the closed shop, and making it more difficult to get a union shop than it has been in the past, and applying to the election on the question of whether to have such a shop a standard which does not apply to the election of a President of the United States or a Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives or a member of a State legislature or a member of a city council or a member of a board of commissioners. In such elections it is only necessary for the successful candidate to receive the votes of a majority of those who vote in the election; but according to the pending measure in order to have a union shop it is necessary that a majority of all those who are eligible to vote shall vote in favor of a union shop. Such a requirement would make a great deal of difference in the political campaigns in the United States, if it were applied to them.

Mr. President, I shall not discuss at length a provision of this measure which authorizes damage suits against labor unions to be filed in the Federal courts, without any requirement of diversity of citizenship or any requirement as to the amount involved, although such requirements are made by the present law. Under this measure, if it should become the law, a union could be dragged into a Federal court even if the amount of damages were only 3 cents. That cannot be done today, under the present law. Moreover, under this measure it would not be necessary to have a diversity of citizenship, as is required under the present Federal law. In that case, again, the pending measure makes it easier to sue a union than has been the case in the past. Such a provision is another restriction upon the effectiveness of a union in representing the workers of the United States.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to raise one more question which I think the Senator from Florida had in mind, but which he has not yet mentioned. I refer to the change in the definition of the word "employer." On page 3 of the conference report we find this statement:

(2) The term "employer" includes any person acting as an agent of an employer, directly or indirectly, but shall not include the United States or any wholly owned Government corporation, or any Federal Reserve bank.

I think it is an interesting commentary that the Federal Reserve banks are not included. After all, they are bankers' banks. I know of no good reason why any exception should be made in the case of a Federal Reserve bank, any more than for any other bank in the United States.

I do know of a case of recent origin, coming from Dallas, Tex., in which the American Federation of Labor succeeded in organizing those employees. It is rather interesting to find now that under this measure the Federal Reserve banks will be excluded from that type of organization.

Of course, I know of no group of American workers who are more deserving and in more need of organization than the white collar workers whom we find working in the banks of the United States.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. The House bill contained a complete exemption of all Government instrumentalities of every kind, which include the national banks. We objected very strenuously to that. We included only wholly Government-owned corporations and Federal Reserve banks. Federal Reserve banks issue the currency of the United States. They perform a governmental functions, even though they are not owned by the Government.

In the second place, no salary and no wages may be paid to the employee of any Federal Reserve bank, except with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board. In that respect also, therefore, they are in a position where they cannot make a collective-bargaining agreement, except with the approval and ratification of the Government of the United States.

Consequently it seemed reasonable to treat them as if they were, for this purpose, wholly Government-owned corporations. As I have said, the function of issuing currency is one which is clearly a governmental function, which should not be interfered with, in my opinion, by strikes.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I think it is a very interesting distinction the Senator from Ohio seems to make in this case. The fact is that the white-collar workers in these banks are not permitted to organize under the protection of the Wagner Act. But if we take the Senator's distinction it is interesting, if we apply it, to follow it to its logical conclusion. The shipping concerns of this country carry the United States mail, and I know of no function more important than the carrying of the mail. It is rather interesting, on that ground, that, because they perform some governmental service, we should say to the maritime workers of America, "You cannot have protection under the Wagner Act." The fact remains that what the bill does is to deny to about 25,000 white-collar workers of this country the effective right to organize for their economic protection.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Oregon for making that valuable contribution.

The bill also takes away the right foremen now have to organize and claim the benefit of the National Labor Relations Act. I am not suggesting that they should, or can, under the present law, belong to the same union to which the workers belong, but they can belong to a separate union, and have their right of collective bargaining protected; but they cannot if the conference report bill shall become law. That privilege would be taken away from them. There are many hundreds of thousands of foremen, or supervisors, as the bill defines a supervisor, working in the plants of America who have the right to bargain collectively with their employers for betterment; but by the conference bill that right is denied.

I shall not prolong the discussion respecting the power of an employer to break a labor union if he chooses to do so. I mean that there is a provision in the bill that any worker who is not entitled to reinstatement cannot vote in an election to choose a collective bargaining agent.

Let us take, for example, a corporation in the State of West Virginia, we will say a coal mine. If the workers of that mine strike because they are dissatisfied with the wages they receive, the employer can recruit labor in West Virginia and put it in the mine. Then he can notify the National Labor Relations Board that he wants another election, and if there has not been an election in a year, he can get an election, under the bill, and the only ones who can vote in the election are the new employees, the strikebreakers, as it were. Of course, they will vote the old union out and vote the new representation in, and the old union will be effectively disposed of. So under the bill all an employer has to do is to provoke his workers to strike, recruit replacements, and put them in permanent status, and call for an election, if there has not been an election in a year, and his new strikebreakers would elect new representatives, and the old union would be effectively disposed of altogether.

I mention only two other sections of the bill. One breaks down the Norris-LaGuardia Act, and subjects the working people of this country to Government by injunction, which I believe is violently contrary to public policy, and to the best interests of all the people of this land.

The last instance is the provision of the bill that workers may be required to stay on the job 80 days if the President directs the Attorney General to apply for an injunction, and if the courts grant an injunction, without anybody being required to better their conditions or meet any of their demands during the 80 days during which they have to stay on the job.

As I have said before, I realize it is a serious problem what to do with the coal mines or the public utilities. We may have to have compulsory arbitration, we may have to nationalize the mines and the utilities, I do not know what we will have to do, but I know that only that remedy is fair which will apply alike to both sides, employer and employee. Provision for such a remedy is not contained in the conference bill. It would make the worker stay on the job 80 days, it would not give him a dime of increase in pay, it would not remove any onerous working conditions which might be the occasion of the dispute.

I have adverted to just a few things which pertain to the Senate bill itself. In conclusion, Mr. President, let me say that all over America today there are teeming millions of working men and women the very standard of whose living is in the hands of the United States Senate when it votes today on this conference report. That body of mer and women is entitled to expect of the Senate of the United States a due and fair regard for the protection of their interests and their rights. Not only that, but as they struggle up the hill, as they try to rise a little higher in the level of life, they are entitled to have help, not hindrance, in their struggle. I am appealing to the Senate of the United States not to put the hand of obstruction in the face of the struggling workingman who is striving up the hard road of life.

I am appealing to the United States Senate, Mr. President, at a time when we need our full production, not to adopt the policy which will stop production and stimulate strife between management and labor in America.

I am appealing to the Senate, Mr. President, not to weaken America in a day of all days when she needs the utmost of her economic and moral strength.

I am appealing to the Senate, Mr. President, to see to it that this measure does not break down the only effective weapon the worker has to better his lot—his own labor organization. Though the labor union may have faults and failures and many defects the bill does not stop with undertaking to remedy those faults and failures and defects, but tries to take away from the worker the very means by which he might advance up the ladder of progress and betterment.

I say to the majority party therefore, that if this is to be their work, then beware the consequences, not merely to the working people of the country, but, as the Wall Street Journal said, beware the contribution it makes to the diminished purchasing power, and to the rapidly approaching depression, which is already rushing toward the American economy; and if we have in America another depression, it will drag the world down to economic chaos, and bathe our country in the flood of communism, from which I doubt if we will be able to remove it for decades in the future.

So, Mr. President, this is not merely a labor bill; this is a bill which relates to the well-being of the American people and to the preservation of democracy at home and abroad.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, an article from the Wall Street Journal of May 14, 1947.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL ECONOMISTS FIND INCREASING SIGNS THAT BOOM IS FADING—INDIVIDUAL SAVINGS TUMBLE; CREDIT BUYING SKYROCKETS; BUILDING "BOOM" LAGS—UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASING

(By Vermont Royster)

WASHINGTON.—The Nation's families are going back to the old American custom of living off next week's pay check.

The rush of cash buyers for automobiles, radios, washing machines, and all the other things that give Americans the world's best standard of living is tapering off. It was a wartime phenomenon anyway. Today we're reverting to the old habit of "$1 down and $1 when you catch me."

To the Government's economists that's just one of a number of telltales whispering that the postwar boom is fading.

Whether the telltales add up to depression, recession, or just a return to normalcy no one knows. But the Nation seems to be "catching up." The high cost of living has caught up with the war-fattened pay envelope. Retailers and wholesalers are catching up on their inventories. Producers are catching up on their backing of orders. And salesmen are beginning to catch up on their old contracts.

SOME OF THE STATISTICS

Here are some statistics Government experts are noting warily in their chart books:

The rate of individuals' savings, squeezed by rising prices, is tumbling despite a second-year round of wage increases. Government figures on first-quarter savings, not yet published, will show the rate of savings has fallen back to about the 1940 level.

Consumer credit, in the doldrums during the lush days, is skyrocketing. The man on the street has returned to his prewar pattern of living up to his income and borrowing when he needs funds.

Spending for luxuries and amusements is on the wane. Even middle-bracket-income families find they have less left over to throw away.

Business' volume of new orders—excepting a few industries—is leveling off. Both wholesalers and retailers are piling up inventories as the production line catches up with customer demand.

The building boom, counted on to take up the reconverrion slack, has failed to live up to expectations. Private reports show industrial construction lags; home building is far below goals.

Unemployment rolls are nudging upward. The Bureau of Labor Statistics is not alarmed, but concedes that the number of gainful workers this summer will be well under earlier optimistic predictions.

The Government experts are not yet ready to hoist a full-fledged storm warning; most basic indices of business activity, such as the Federal Reserve Board's over-all production index, are still high. But the "small craft" warning is already flying. Some businesses have already felt the cooling wind, and others are worried by the falling barometer even though overhead the skies are sunny.

THE SQUEEZE TIGHTENS

The first pinch is being felt by the man-in-the-street, the ultimate consumer, whose ability to save is being squeezed out by the high cost of living.

Commerce Department figures for the first quarter of this year, soon to be published, are expected to show that the rate of savings out of income has declined from the wartime peak to about the 1940 level.

In 1940 the Nation's families as a whole were saving about 10 percent of their net income after taxes. This rate rose sharply during the war until in 1945 nearly 24 percent of income was set aside for savings.

At the war's end this savings rate slid off to about 12 to 13 percent of income and held steady until OPA's demise. With the end of price controls, rising living costs soon squeezed out the little extra gained from pay boosts. Today the Nation is back to a 10 percent rate.

Actually, savings of lower income groups appear to have taken an even worse beating, although no conclusive data are available. An analysis of Government savings bond redemptions shows that while total bond purchases are still high, cash-ins of the lower denominational bonds are more than twice as heavy as cash-ins of the bigger bonds.

SMALL BONDS CASHED IN

Nearly half the $25 bond issues—favorites of wage earners—which were purchased in 1945 had been redeemed a year later, and this rate seems to be increasing. Only 11 percent of the $500 and $1,000 denominations had been redeemed.

As a corollary, this drop in savings has been accompanied by an increase in the volume of short-term consumer credit. Right after the war there was a lot of cash-on-the-line buying of the few available consumer goods. Today, more and more families are mortgaging their next week's and next month's pay checks to get that automobile or radio or washing machine.

In 1946 all types of consumer credit jumped by $2,400,000,000. In March of this year instalment credit alone increased by $70,000,000 to a level nearly 65 percent higher that March of 1945. All in all, consumer credit is hitting a record high level. What worries the experts is that this is happening in a "boom" year when people are supposed to have plenty of cash to burn.

The troubles of the man-in-the-street are being reflected elsewhere too.

Business volume of new orders has already begun to level off except in a few industries. So far production has cut only moderately into the backlog of orders, but the fact that the backlog has been reduced at all is a sign of the changing times. Commerce officials report that the "early rush to place new orders is now over."

INVENTORIES ACCUMULATING

As would naturally be expected from this, inventories are accumulating on wholesalers' and retailers' shelves. This is true of even such once hard-to-get items as automatic washing machines, FM radios, men's shirts, and, of course, nylon stockings.

The passing of the lush-money days has brought some shifts in spending too.

The bust in the night-club business is already an old story. Now almost all luxury and amusement businesses have been hard hit by the competition for the consumers scarcer dollar. And finally, there are indications that the man on the street is getting more penurious about spending for the semi-luxuries. He's finding he bas less extra money than he thought.

That discovery has been particularly hard on the home-building industry. A private survey by a real-estate association, borne out by Government reports, shows that many building plans have gone up in pipe smoke. Prices for existing houses are tottering also in most parts of the country.

Building construction had been looked on by most Government economists as a potential "life saver" in a postwar slump. A vigorous construction program, it was hoped, would take up the slack as it did after World War I. Thus, if the would-be builders are being priced out of the market, as it now appears they are, the Government seers see trouble ahead.

The Government has already turned slightly bearish on its employment prospect predictions. United States Employment Service officials, who once foresaw boom-times for job hunters this summer and fall, are beginning to hedge their predictions. They still insist that employment will "hold up" through the year, but they admit the outlook is "not nearly so good as we thought earlier." Currently, the jobless amount to about 2,400,000.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3020) to prescribe fair and equitable rules of conduct to be observed by labor and management in their relations with one another which affect commerce, to protect the rights of individual workers in their relations with labor organizations whose activities affect commerce, to recognize the paramount public interest in labor disputes affecting commerce that endanger the public health, safety, or welfare, and for other purposes.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I shall take just a few minutes to discuss a few phases of the bill which I think are dangerous.

In the first place, it has always been a matter of regret to me that legislative action in the United States should ever be of the pendulum variety. We find a wrong, and we swing over and correct the wrong. Possibly we swing a little too far, and we swing back to correct that. Usually, then, we swing as far in the opposite direction as we had previously swung, or even farther. I think the President of the United States in his message to Congress on the question of labor legislation suggested to Congress how to stop the pendulum in the center with legislation that would be fair to management and labor alike. Labor cannot exist without management, and without labor management has nothing to manage. Management and labor are the basis of our economy, and it is highly important they be kept in balance. It is highly important that both be considered.

It is true the bill before us is called a mild bill. I may suggest that a 25-percent solution of carbolic acid might be considered mild, compared to a 100-percent solution. The pending bill is called mild, because the Senate saw fit to tone it down, and the conference, in the main, sustained some of the results of the toning-down process. The bill was described aptly by its author, Representative HARTLEY, on the floor of the House when he said the purpose of the legislation was to break the union down to the local level. Mr. President, that is not a laudable attitude. We know that the greatest good has come to the union by consolidating into larger unions. We know that management prefers industry-wide bargaining, or at least bargaining with large groups. They prefer to level off wage scales, so they can compete with one another. That was the purpose of the original bill. That purpose was defeated in the Senate.

Some people, Mr. President, I am very sorry to say, are cherishing the idea of breaking union leadership. Is it a good thing to break the leadership of any organization? Would it be a good thing to break down the strength of leadership in government, the leadership of churches, the leadership of industry, for instance? Is it wise to weaken and to break it down? Is it a good plan to legislate just because of animosity toward a certain individual? I need not mention individuals who have aroused the public ire. Is it wise to enact legislation directly affecting 15,000,000 people, because some persons may be irked temporarily by one or two prominent labor leaders? Yet it was in that spirit of resentment that the bill was drafted, and it will be in that spirit that the bill is passed.

The constructive suggestion by the President, with which I was in hearty accord, recommended the formation of a commission to find out what if any amendment is needed in the existing labor laws and the laws governing industry, and the laws governing the relations between management and labor, in order to correct manifest inequities, in a sensible manner, striking a middle-of-the-road course. Such a commission would be expected not to be actuated by a fit of temper because of the acts of some person which were temporarily offensive to the public.

A great deal is said about the mandate of the 1946 election. I may say, Mr. President, it was a very feeble mandate, by a very small percentage of the people. A mandate is supposed to be an expression of the popular sentiment. Let me call attention to the mandate of the 1944 election, in which a large percentage of the people voted, perhaps twice as many as the voters who gave the so-called mandate in 1946. If I were to describe the 1946 mandate, I would say it was the mandate of absentees.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KILGORE. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator would say also it is probably a temporary mandate, too, would he not?

Mr. KILGORE. I thank the Senator from Florida for the remark. To illustrate the manner in which we are departing from the 1944 mandate, I call attention to the fact that there was no platform in the 1946 election. I challenge either party to show that it had a platform in 1946. How can there be a mandate by the people, unless there is a platform? I have yet to hear of any Member of Congress who ran for office in any area, on the basis of declaring, "We are going to crucify labor. Yet it is said a mandate was given in 1946. Let us see how that mandate of 1944, the real mandate, is being followed. In that year there was the platform of the Republican Party. I shall refer to title 2 of the bill as reported by the conference committee, a title which I think has not been touched on as yet. Let us see how that corresponds to the only mandate that the Republican Party has, so far as I can see, or that the Democratic Party has, namely, the party platform, on the basis of which in 1944 the voters cast their votes, to a far greater extent than they did in 1946. In that platform, was it recommended that the Labor Relations Board be divorced from the Department of Labor? In vetoing the Case bill, President Truman branded the establishment of an independent agency as a step backward.

Our minority leader, in describing the provision of the bill, called it a fatal infirmity. I agree with President Truman, and I agree with our distinguished minority leader. Let us see what the Republican platform of 1944 said on the subject. In that platform they promised to place all Government labor activities under the Secretary of Labor. That was a specific promise, that all Government labor activities should be placed under the Secretary of Labor. I challenge any Senator to say that he publicly avowed his intention of wrecking labor unions or seriously hampering their powers, during the campaign. But today it is suggested that we take the Government labor activities out from under the Secretary of Labor. What else does the conference bill do? It renders the Board a relatively innocuous group. It is increased to five members, and is given a chief counsel. It still has a trial examiner. But, Mr. President, the bill takes away the right of appeal from the finding of the trial examiner, unless a member of the Board, one of five men, covering all disputes within the United States, elects to make a review of it himself; and he is not furnished counsel to assist him in making the review. So, we have weakened the right of appeal. The right of appeal that heretofore existed has been taken away.

As I say, I agree with the Republican platform that the activities in the field of labor-management relations, particularly so far as labor is concerned, should be centralized in the Department of Labor. If not, then let us get rid of a Cabinet position, and of a Cabinet officer.

Furthermore, the National Labor Relations Act failed to contain an economic sanction. How can the board reach any finding on a wage dispute, unless they know something of the economics of living in the particular segment of society involved in that dispute?

Another point I wish to mention briefly is the right of the employer to petition for an election. That subject was ably discussed by the Senator from Florida, but I want to mention one other factor. Heretofore, a labor organization could apply for an election. I think it was a weakness in the law, because they could apply and reapply, and that caused disturbances. Under the pending bill, the employer may apply, and after one election is held, nothing further can be done for a year. The danger of that lies in the fact that it may be used to forestall the organization of a plant. Thus we crucified the unorganized workers a very short time ago, when we said to them, "You cannot even enforce the Minimum Wages and Hours Act in the courts of the United States, unless you have a contract with your employer."

Are they all going to be able to secure individual contracts? Mr. President, we all know that the only way they can secure contracts is by collective bargaining, and if we eliminate that provision the employer can, by calling an election in a hurry, forestall organization and get by, and, incidentally, become what I call a "gyp" operator, too many of whom are today operating in the United States on 20 and 30 cents an hour labor in competition with decent men who operate on, say, 60 cents an hour labor. That is another weakness in the present bill which I think is highly dangerous. There are several other weaknesses in it which I have touched upon in the past.

Mr. President, the particular point I want to stress is this: I think we should think seriously before we hamstring our workers, before we strike down their rights. I well remember one incident. In the early part of the war I was in a large airplane factory on the west coast talking to the manager about the workers. I asked him how the women were getting along in the plant. That was in the early days of women working in airplane factories. The manager said, "They do good work, but I am having trouble." I said, "What is the matter?" He said, "Women will not join the union. While this is not a closed-shop plant we have a union contract, and the men belong to the union and the women do not. That simply results in the stirring up of turmoil in the plant and it is holding back production." Eventually all the women joined the union and production speeded up, and that source of discontent was removed.

Mr. President, I have spoken to a number of industrialists who have told me they would not operate a plant which was part union and part nonunion; that such a plant was troublesome to operate, that there was always bickering among the employees. Yet in this measure we do our utmost to wipe out the idea of a plant-wide union, and instead to make it not only possible, but highly probable, that there will be part union and part nonunion plants.

When labor's throat is cut, 60,000,000 people, who not only produce, but who buy, and by their buying keep the market alive, have their buying power destroyed. The people of the United States in the past, prior to the war, bought 95 percent of our production. We know the people of the United States will have to buy 85 percent of our production if we are to have anywhere near full employment.

When a policy is followed which will result in breaking up labor organizations and sniping at labor leaders, it may in many cases present situations which will result in the wrecking of the treasury of the labor organizations. Let us be fair, Mr. President, both ways. Under the bill a policy may be begun which may result in wrecking the treasury of an international organization. Indeed, such a wrecking would be a very simple thing under the wording of this bill with its rather loose agency definition. Even in what is known as a mine committee in the coal mine, one member of the mine committee could precipitate a suit against the international organization which might wreck the entire treasury. Such an individual might be hot-headed or he might be misled.

Let us recur to the question whether or not the bill would preclude unions from participating in politics. Let us consider the railroad brotherhood. I do not think anyone will question that they are a fairly conservative organization. They have legislative committees selected by the membership, and those legislative committees meet prior to an election. They analyze the legislative records of all the candidates on both tickets, and, they will not recommend an individual who has no legislative record. He must have had one before they will endorse him. Based upon such record they have in the past sent to their membership their recommendations with reference to various candidates running for national and State offices. Under the pending bill they could not spend the money for postage stamps to send out such recommendations. They could not spend the money necessary to print such a recommendation, which is an official action of an official group of their own body elected by them to perform a specific duty. They are precluded from doing that. I can see no way in the world, under the provision in the bill with respect to expenditure, that they could do so. It is not merely a question of radio talks. There is involved their right to hold meetings, to study the relative merits of candidates in elections, to study the relative merits of programs of parties, to decide which platform measures up the best in their belief, and to make known their decision.

Mr. President, I think we are going several steps too far and we are going too far too fast. I think we are removing constitutional rights which belong to the people. A workingman is a constitutional person. A corporation is a legislative legal entity. I believe activities of corporations can be curbed much more easily than activities of a human being can be curbed, be he a laborer, be he a banker, or be he the president of a corportation, or a Member of the United States Senate.

The bill goes even further, Mr. President. It speaks of "associations of employees." It does not speak of "associations of employers." It does not speak of "associations of corporations." There are many loopholes which would permit expenditures by one side, but no opportunity is given for the worker to defend himself. That is what I fear with respect to the bill. I fear what will happen in the future under it. I fear, just as the Senator from Florida said he feared, the ultimate crash that may result under it, the trend toward communism that may ensue.

We have spoken much about communism. Everyone is afraid of communism. No one seems to be able to put his finger on what it is. But I fear the trend toward communism which may ultimately occur and the break-down of the body politic if what is now proposed to be done shall be consummated. The break-down will come when we have reduced the worker to the point where he is at the mercy of his exploiters.

I expressed the fear of what may happen when, a short time ago, the alleged portal-to-portal measure was passed. I say "alleged" advisedly. The measure had very little to do with portal-to-portal pay. It was mainly designed to take away from the individual nonunion worker the ability to protect his right. Now we are trying to do the same to the union worker. The two measures constitute two steps in the wrong direction, two steps toward chaos, two steps toward such a course as began back in 1921 and led down to the smash of 1929. They constitute two steps the United States Senate should not take.

Mr. President, I trust the Senate will not be so blind as to agree to the conference report. It was my hope that we could wait, not a long time, but until we could receive advice from persons who have studied the problem respecting what amendments are necessary to cure the evils we want to cure, instead of simply cutting and slashing ahead. We should call in able men who can make a diagnosis of the situation. Instead I am afraid we will be calling in men to perform an autopsy on the economic structure of the United States.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, the hour is late and I shall be brief. There are one or two things I should like to say concerning the pending bill before final action is taken upon it. The turbulence of the present debate is indicative of the turbulence which is connected with the consideration of this whole question. All of us who have been closely associated with the formulation of the bill have had that condition more and more borne in upon us as a tremendous force in its consideration. However, I think there are a few fundamental things which we should consider in these final hours in which the debate is closing.

In the first place I think it is generally agreed among those who may oppose this legislation as it stands, that some legislation is necessary. There may be a few exceptions, but I doubt if there are many.

With that hypothesis, that premise, last January we began hearings before the Senate committee on the various bills dealing with this question. I for one had hoped that no legislation might be required. I entertained that hope because it seemed to me that if we could once get collective bargaining itself actually to operating as it should operate, very little if any legislation would be necessary. But the course of the hearings indicated to me, as they progressed, that there are abuses, that inequities exist under the present statute, and that the abuses must be corrected and the inequities eliminated.

With that conclusion, I offered some legislation of my own. I tried to be as moderate as possible in its preparation. However, even the legislation which I proposed, mild as it was—and I dare say it was the mildest legislation of all introduced—met with plenty of objectors. So I say that in the consideration of this question, based upon the hypothesis I have stated, in a great controversial question of this type it is impossible to obtain legislation on which all of us can be agreed, or upon which, in all probability, a substantial majority of us can be agreed in full. I dare say that any bill that might be drafted by any Member of this body dealing with this subject, even though it might meet with the particular Member's complete ideas on the question, would not completely meet another person's ideas.

That is the story of controversial legislation. How do we handle it? Each person cannot stand unalterably by himself and say, "I am going to have it this way, or that way." We should never be able to legislate on controversial matters if that were the situation. So we compromise. We get together, constantly bearing in mind our over-all objectives.

That is what happened in this particular instance. I am quite sure that not even the Senate bill which was reported from the Senate committee met with the complete approval of all of us. There were things about even that bill which I did not entirely like. Certainly the bill as finally passed by the Senate did not completely meet with my approval.

And so it has been with the conference report. Bear in mind always that we are dealing with extremists as well as with those who would pursue a middle-of-the road policy. I am not reflecting upon any Member of the Senate or of the House. I am reflecting on the public at large, whose influence is quite extensive—thank fortune. We are dealing with some who would like to see labor organizations and legitimate trade unionism in this country destroyed. There is no doubt about it. On the other hand, we are faced with a situation in which those immediately connected with trade unionism refuse to agree to any type of legislation. They refuse to admit that anything is wrong.

No one could have listened at the hearings during the past winter without knowing that some things are wrong. Yet, when the question arose as to the help which we might be able to receive from those who would be most immediately affected by the legislation, namely, the representatives of organized labor, we received no help whatever. We were left to go it alone. So I say that organized labor has no right to complain too bitterly about the type of legislation upon which we are agreed. They had their chance, and they did not come through.

Mr. President, the opposition to this legislation is similar to the opposition of other types of controversial legislation which we have had before us. The opposition is a combination. It comprises those who claim that the conference bill will absolutely destroy legitimate trade unionism; and we have heard that argument made in the course of this debate. Coupled with that type of opposition there are those on the outside—I am sure that no such sentiment exists in this body—who are opposed to this type of legislation because they believe it does not go as far as they want to go. In other words, it would not destroy trade unionism.

The answer is very simple. This legislation as a whole—and the bill must be viewed as a whole—pursues a middle course. It will not destroy trade unionism. As a matter of fact, properly administered, this legislation should go a long way toward improving conditions in trade unionism.

Mr. President, I recognize that this bill is not perfect. We could not have a perfect bill in the midst of such a controversy. I dare say that I would probably find fault here and there with any type of bill dealing with the subject which might be presented, except a bill which I myself might draft. So the question immediately arises, Shall we face the condition as we find it? Shall we accept the legislation as we find it? Shall we endeavor, through this legislation, to reconcile the differing views of the extremists with whom we must deal? I dare say that the bill before us more nearly reflects the over-all judgment of the Congress of the United States than any other piece of legislation dealing with this subject which could be evolved. That is the significance of this particular bill. Surely it has defects. I recognize them. I should be opposed to it if it were not for the fact that it contains one or two features which I believe to be fundamental. Fortunately those features are part of the bill.

I recognize that in the administration of the new statute real discretion and ability must be shown. That is the first thing we must have. We know the type of National Labor Relations Board which we have. I for one have confidence in that Board.

I have confidence that the two additional members to be chosen under this bill, if it is enacted into law, will be of that same high caliber. If we have that type of administration, even with some of the defects which the bill may contain, we have not too much to worry about in the immediate future.

The second thing which is vital in this matter is an appropriation sufficient to take care of the administration of the act. Let us not deceive ourselves about that. It does not make any difference what type of legislation we may be passing in this instance, if there is not an appropriation sufficient for its administration, no matter how excellent it may be, it never can work satisfactorily. That, too, is fundamental in this question. I assume that an appropriation sufficient to carry out its provisions will be made.

Thirdly, and this, Mr. President, is most important of all, and it is something which all of those who are critics of this legislation should constantly bear in mind, this bill in itself is not an end product. If it becomes a law it will be, and rightfully so, subject to change during the years ahead. One of the great troubles with the National Labor Relations Act has been that it has not been changed. The whole field of labor relations is an extremely dynamic field, constantly changing in every way, in techniques, procedures, and everything else; and to say that 12 years ago we could or today we can enact legislation and expect that legislation to hold up for an indefinite period of time—certainly that has been the case with the Wagner Act—is something beyond the realm of probability. If the National Labor Relations Act had been changed 9 or 10 years ago, as it should have been, we should not be faced today with the situation which confronts us. But it was not changed.

So I say we have this problem of changing it on our hands; and again I say that we must remember that this bill is not an end product.

What is the answer? The bill itself provides the answer. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], who just spoke, suggested a commission for study. We do not need any commission for study at this moment before this legislation is enacted. We would not get any better legislation than that which we have today. What we do need now is to have established a group of that type to see how this legislation itself is working, to follow it, to check with the administrators of it, to find out if the procedures and techniques which they are following are of the kind which enables them to produce the results which we are seeking. That, Mr. President, is prepared for in the creation of a joint congressional committee as provided for in title IV of the bill.

I am not worried about this bill. Recognizing and accepting all of the charges which have been made against it, I am not worried about it, because if that committee is established and if it does the job which it should do and can do, most of the things which have been anticipated will never come to pass. I know whereof I speak in this instance. I have been through this kind of situation before. Where flaws show up, as inevitably they will, I assume that the committee will have the common sense and intelligence to make recommendations to the next session of the Congress to see that amendments are prepared and enacted.

I want to say in closing that if anything shows up which is harmful to the trade-union movement in this country, as a result of this legislative action—if the bill is finally enacted into law, I shall be among the first to do my utmost to see that such a situation is corrected. That is the way we progress, Mr. President. That is the way we go forward in this country. If we always had the way clear, if we always knew where we were going, we would not be living in this world. We have to take things as we find them. This type of legislation is the only type of legislation with which to approach and, finally, to solve the problems of labor relations which face us.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate more than a very few moments, but before we vote I wish very briefly to give, not in detail, but merely in the briefest sort of outline, my reasons for being unable to support the conference report.

Mr. President, I recognize the truthfulness of the statement made by the Senator from New York [Mr. IVES] that legislation of this sort deals with a dynamic subject. It deals with human emotions; it deals intimately with a man's relationship to his family and his ability to support his family as he should like to support it, in order to give it an equal chance, if possible, with the family of every other American citizen. I realize how difficult it is for men who have strong convictions to come together on legislation involving so much controversy as that which any labor legislation necessarily involves.

I voted against the bill when it passed the Senate recently, and I gave in some detail my reasons for my inability to support it, which I shall not reiterate at this time. Among the reasons which I gave was my fear that in view of the House bill, when it came back to us it would be a worse bill, from my standpoint, than it was when it passed the Senate. While I concede that the conferees made some modifications in the provisions of the House bill and eliminated some others, which improved the legislation, I still think that out of the 34 changes made by the conferees in the legislation the Senate conferees yielded on more than a majority of them, some of which were more or less technical and routine, but some of which were important, in my judgment, and which, to that extent, made the bill a worse bill than it was when it passed the Senate a few weeks ago.

Moreover, Mr. President, there were some eight or ten new provisions put into the conference report which were not in either bill. A point of order was made against them in the House, and in a long decision the Speaker overruled the point of order, and therefore there is no point in my arguing that question, and I do not do so.

My objection to this legislation and my inability to support it do not grow out of my intransigent attitude toward labor legislation. They do not grow out of any desire on my part to have no bill at all; but I am not required, either by my own conscience or by the situation which exists in this country, as I see it, to vote for a bill the majority of whose provisions I think are objectionable, in order to get some things for which, if incorporated in the bill by themselves, I would vote.

In the first place, I reiterate my objection to this measure because it does something which I think should not be done, and that is something that conferees could not remedy, because it was contained in both bills: The conference report removes the Conciliation Service from the Department of Labor. The Conciliation Service has never been, to my knowledge, accused of partisan action. It has never been given public credit for the magnificent work it has done in settling thousands upon thousands of labor controversies and preventing thousands upon thousands of strikes. Its services in that respect never got into the newspapers and never were accorded to the Conciliation Service on the credit side of its operations. I still agree with the Republican platform in 1944 and with the Republican candidate in 1944 in advocating that all labor activities and all labor agencies should be consolidated under the general jurisdiction of the Secretary of Labor. I raised my objection to that provision when the bill was passed by the Senate. My objection has not been removed by anything the conferees have done.

Mr. President, I object to this measure because it does what we have seldom, if ever, done before: It leaves to the determination of the local authorities in a State the question whether a Federal law shall be in effect in that State. There is not a criminal statute on the books, passed by any Congress, within Federal jurisdiction, that states that if a legislature of any State shall pass a law contrary to the act of Congress, the act of Congress shall be null and void insofar as that State is concerned. We might as well pass an act of Congress against counterfeiting the currency of the United States, but in it provide that if any State legislature authorizes counterfeiting, then the Federal law shall be null and void in that State. We might as well say that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the right under the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States by regulating the rates that affect interstate commerce, but also provide that if a State legislature shall pass a law contrary to that regulation, then the Federal regulation shall be null and void. The Constitution of the United States provides that all taxes shall be uniform throughout the United States. It does not make a similar requirement with respect to other legislation. However, it seems to me utterly inconsistent for Congress to assume jurisdiction over interstate commerce and then provide that its administration shall be spotty to the extent that any State legislature in the United States may nullify an act of Congress by passing a law of a different effect.

That is what this measure does, Mr. President. It provides that there may be a union shop; it undertakes to abolish the closed shop. But it says there may be a union shop, provided a majority of those who are eligible to vote in that shop—regardless of whether they vote—do vote in favor of having a union shop. As the Senator from Florida pointed out so ably, that is a principle of plebiscites and elections that is not recognized anywhere in the laws of the United States.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. It is recognized in the constitution of Ohio. In order for a bill to be passed in the Ohio Legislature, it is necessary that it receive the affirmative votes of a majority of all those elected to the legislature, no matter how many are present. The principle is not a departure from any fundamental democratic principle.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not dispute the constitutional provision of Ohio that in order to pass a law a majority of the elected representatives shall vote for it. But such a principle is not recognized in any elections, except in the States that require that a majority of all the votes cast shall be required in order to nominate for office, in which case if there is not a majority it is necessary to have a run-off primary. To that extent, no validity is recognized in a nomination unless the nomination is made by a majority of those who vote. But even in those States, it is not required that a majority of the eligible voters shall register their favoritism or preference for any particular candidate. Even though less than a majority of all the eligible voters in the State may vote in a primary or in an election, the man or woman who receives a majority of the votes cast is elected.

Let us suppose there is a labor organization in any plant—a union or even not a union—and let us suppose that a thousand persons work in the plant and that all thousand of them are eligible to vote. Let us further suppose that only 600 of them vote. Under the provision we are now discussing, 501 of the 600 would be required to vote affirmatively in order to have what this measure calls a union shop. It may be said that the other 500 should have voted. Perhaps they should have. It might even be said that 49 percent of the American people, who sometimes do not vote in an election, should vote. However, sometimes they do not. Nevertheless, their failure to vote does not invalidate the election. Some Members of the Senate have not received the votes of a majority of all the eligible voters in the States in which they are elected.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I wish to say that I think the nearest analogy to what the Senator is discussing is to be found in the Federal Marketing Agreement Act which requires that 66⅔ percent of all the producers of a certain commodity in a certain area must give their consent in favor of the marketing agreement before it can be put into effect. That is a very stiff requirement, and it means that conditions must be so desperate that two-thirds of all the farmers who are eligible to vote will vote for a Federal marketing agreement. Nevertheless, time and again it has been necessary for that to be done in order to save their economic lives.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I happened to be in the Senate at the time when the Agricultural Adjustment Act was passed. We tried to make it democratic in the real sense that the farmers themselves should decide whether it should be applicable to their crops; and in Kentucky we had election after election with respect to tobacco. In order that no group of farmers might complain because a bare majority had made the law applicable to their crops, we did require that 66⅔ percent should be required to vote in favor of the application of the marketing agreement before it should go into effect. I think that is still the law, and I think we have had from 90 to 93 percent of the farmers vote to put such a marketing law in effect.

Mr. AIKEN. That is true. But the situation has to be very bad and very desperate before that many votes can be obtained.

Mr. BARKLEY. But the situation with respect to quotas on agricultural products is quite different from the situation in regard to the voting of a body of laboring men as to whether they wish to have a union shop in the plant in which they work. I object to that principle, Mr. President. I will not go into further detail about it, but I object to it because I do not believe it is a fair principle; I do not believe it is fair to require, in effect, that a majority of all those who work in a plant and who are eligible to vote shall be registered in favor of a union shop, before a union shop can be installed in that plant.

So, Mr. President, I have registered three objections to the proposed legislation: first, the requirement that the majority of all those who can vote must be registered; second, the requirement that in any State where a legislature has passed what we call a nonunion or closed-shop bill, even a majority of those who want to vote cannot register their desire because they cannot even hold an election in such a State. I do not recall how many States have recently enacted such legislation. I think it is 10 or 12. Perhaps the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] can tell me. There are a dozen or more, I think.

Mr. MURRAY. I think there are that many, at least.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would say, roughly, a dozen or more States. I am not impugning the motives of legislatures. They have a perfect right to do that with respect to intra-State business if they see fit to do it. They have a perfect right to control what happens in their State, so long as it does not interfere with interstate business. The Supreme Court has held time and time again that when the United States Congress intervenes in a field where it is supreme, the law it passes shall take precedence, in the regulation of commerce among the States, over any State law which may be enacted, either for intrastate commerce or which might indirectly affect interstate business.

Mr. President, I think the provision proposed is an unwise precedent. I think it cannot be justified in good government and good legislation. I do not believe that any State legislature should have the right to nullify an act of Congress so that it will not take effect in that State. That is a serious objection to the proposed legislation, in my judgment.

There are other things which I might record as reasons for my objection. I do not believe that the restriction placed upon the activities of labor organizations in the matter of expressing their views concerning candidates and issues places them on an equality with their employers in doing the same thing.

Mr. President, the proposed law makes it unlawful for a labor organization, without mentioning the name of any candidate for office, to issue a pamphlet or an advertisement in a newspaper advocating a position for or against something which might affect an election.

Certainly that is not on an equality with the practices of associated and organized employers issuing full-page advertisements all over the country. We know that last year, when certain legislation was pending in the Congress, full-page advertisements were printed all over the United States against certain things. They did not say anything about candidates, but the things they were advocating or opposing could be easily identified with candidates running for office, for the Congress, for instance, at that time. This was just before the election. They did that, and if it was in violation of any law in existence, nothing was done about it, and I do not know that it was in violation of any law. But under the conference report bill no labor organization could do the same thing.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. Along the line of the Senator's remarks, I have before me a statement of the National Association of Manufacturers which on July 3, 1946, in an advertisement entitled "The Future With Confidence," published in the Washington Post, had this to say:

> The members of the National Association of Manufacturers have no intention of rocking the inflation boat—now or at any other time.
> If OPA is permanently discontinued, the production of goods will mount rapidly and, through free competition, prices will quickly adjust themselves to levels that consumers are willing to pay.
> The great majority of American manufacturers are determined to produce as much as they can, as fast as they can, to sell at the lowest possible prices.
> American manufacturers are also determined that such price increases as may be necessary will be only those fully justified by increases in wage and other production costs.

That is one of the advertisements that appeared in the newspapers all over the United States, paid for by the National Association of Manufacturers.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I do not see any fundamental difference in principle between expressing one's opinion with respect to the qualifications of a man who is appealing to the people to elect him to office, and putting intense pressure on him here in Washington after he is elected to office. It is no more harmful to go before 27,000,000 or 40,000,000 people in advocacy of, or in opposition to, some principle of government than it is to descend on Washington and put pressure on 96 Senators or 435 Members of the House of Representatives; and that is not unlawful, and is not made unlawful by the proposed legislation, or any other bill I know anything about, unless they resort to some criminal practice, bribery or some other practice that is unlawful per se.

So, Mr. President, without any further discussion and without taking the time of the Senate and delaying a vote upon the proposed legislation, I wish to say that I cannot support the conference report bill. I speak only for myself; I do not pretend to represent anyone in the Senate except myself.

I am not speaking for the President of the United States. I do not know what his attitude will be toward the proposed legislation. I do feel that when it is sent to him he will analyze it and have it analyzed as fully as is possible, and as fully as he should do, to determine what its provisions are. After he has done that, I am sure he will act upon it as his own conscience dictates to him, according to his own conception of his high duty, without regard to any effect it may have upon him, politically or otherwise. I have that much confidence in the President of the United States, who, in addition to his many other qualities, is an honest man, a fearless man, and a sincere man, a man who, in the exercise of the high office which he holds, desires to do as nearly right as he knows how.

In this connection I am tempted to quote a phrase of Lincoln's which I think applies to President Truman. In his debate with Stephen A. Douglas in Illinois in 1858, when he was a candidate for the United States Senate and was advocating certain things, a delegation came to Mr. Lincoln in Springfield one day and said, "Mr. Lincoln, you cannot be elected, you cannot win the senatorship, by advocating the things for which you stand." I can imagine how Abraham Lincoln straightened up to his full 6 feet 4 inches and said, "Gentlemen, I am not bound to win, but I am bound to be right."

Mr. President, that is an immortal sentence, one which, to me, speaks the very essence of statesmanship, sincerity and morality. I think that that remark of Abraham Lincoln can be applied to President Harry S. Truman. He is not bound to win, and I could not tell him how he could win, for I have no crystal ball in which I can see what the people may do in any election. I would say to him that he is not bound to win, but he is bound in good conscience to be right, according to his own conception of what may be right, after seeking all the advice he can obtain.

Since I have voted against the bill, Mr. President, I have received many letters. Some of them have praised me for the vote I cast. Others have criticized me for the vote. To those who have approved my vote and have expressed their approval in correspondence I have of course nothing but appreciation, and to those who have criticized me for voting against the bill I say that I appreciate their frankness, because their criticism has not been bitter. Some of the letters disagreeing with my vote have been from my warmest friends. I appreciate their frankness, I appreciate their sincerity. I give them the same right I claim for myself, the right to be judged by their own conceptions of their duty.

We cannot satisfy all men. We will be fortunate if we satisfy ourselves that we have done our duty according to the light that Almighty God gives us in order that our feet may follow the path of rectitude.

Mr. President, I am sorry, deeply sorry, that a bill was not produced which I could consistently and conscientiously support, but I cannot support the pending conference report, and therefore I am compelled to vote against it.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I do not intend to make a speech. I merely say that I filed an explanation of the conference report, which appears in yesterday's RECORD. We will check some of the statements made today, which have not been actually corrected on the floor, and I will later file a statement that may further explain some of the mistakes that have been made by those who criticize the provisions of the conference bill.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, on yesterday, I asked the chairman of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], how many concessions had been made to the House bill. The Senator informed me that in his opinion only three important changes or concessions had been made. I do not quarrel with the Senator's evaluation of whether the changes were important or of secondary importance. The reason I ask the question is because, as the two bills have been rightly described by the press, the Senate bill was a milder bill than the original House bill. I was wondering to what extent the final bill had absorbed the so-called harsh House bill. The managers on the part of the House, in a statement to the House, intimated and implied, by way of generalities, that more of the House bill than of the Senate bill was included in the conference report. As a matter of fact, the chairman of the House Labor Committee stated on the floor of the House, at page 6383 of the RECORD, and this is very significant:

> I think you are going to find there is more in this bill than may meet the eye.

In that statement, I agree with the chairman of the House committee; there is much more. But, for the purpose of the RECORD, I have made an analysis of the conference report. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that some of the changes are minor. I do not agree that only three important concessions were made. But, for the sake of the RECORD, by actual count, there are 36 concessions made by the Senate managers, 36 absorptions of the harsh House bill. Not to delay the Senate any longer, I have underlined them in red in the conference report, and I would like to ask unanimous consent to have the underlined portions placed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator will remember that, as I said, yesterday I placed in the RECORD a complete analysis of the changes, with explanations of what they were. The most of them were not acceptances of the harsher House bill. They were acceptances of the statement in a somewhat different form, or they were in regard to reaffirming the existing law.

I have listened to four complete criticisms of these changes, in the last 2 days. I do not think those criticisms have led me in any way to change the statement I made earlier, that we conceded no important change. We conceded nothing to the House, which the Senate had debated and discussed. We conceded no further measures which I regarded, myself, as of importance; but I am of course glad to have the statement offered by the Senator from Washington placed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington?

There being no objection, the excerpts from the statement of the managers on the part of the House were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1. The conference agreement adopts the short title of the House bill.

2. The conference agreement contains the declaration of policy of the House bill, with one omission.

3. And thus the conference agreement adopts the definition of person contained in the House bill.

4. The conference agreement follows the provisions of the House bill in the matter of agents of an employer.

5. The conference agreement follows the provisions of the House bill in excluding from the definition of "employee" all individuals employed by persons who do not come within the definition of "employers," not limiting this exclusion, as did the Senate amendment, to employees of persons subject to the Railway Labor Act.

6. The conference agreement follows the House bill in the matter of persons having the status of independent contractors.

7. The conference agreement contains the same definition of "professional employee" as that contained in the Senate amendment, and accords to this category the same treatment which was provided for them in section 9 (f) (3) of the House bill.

8. The conference agreement contains in the definition section a rule to be applied for the purpose of determining when a person is acting as an "agent" of another person so as to make such other person responsible for his acts. A provision having the same effect was contained in section 12 of the House bill, under which the Norris-LaGuardia Act was made inapplicable in connection with certain activities dealt with in that section. Hence, under the conference agreement, as under the House bill, both employers and labor organizations will be responsible for the acts of their agents in accordance with the ordinary common law rules of agency (and only ordinary evidence will be required to establish the agent's authority).

9. The conference agreement does not make provision for an independent agency to exercise the investigating and prosecuting functions under the act, but does provide that there shall be a General Counsel of the Board, who is to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of 4 years. The General Counsel is to have general supervision and direction of all attorneys employed by the Board (excluding the trial examiners and the legal assistants to the individual members of the Board), and of all the officers and employees in the Board's regional offices, and is to have the final authority to act in the name of, but independently of any direction, control, or review by, the Board in respect of the investigation of charges and the issuance of complaints of unfair labor practices, and in respect of the prosecution of such complaints before the Board.

10. The only change in this section from existing law is the insertion of the words "in the manner prescribed by the Administrative Procedure Act." This insertion appeared in the House bill but not in the Senate amendment.

11. The second change made by the House bill in section 7 of the act (which is carried into the conference agreement) also has an important bearing on the kinds of concerted activities which are protected by section 7.

12. This provision contained in the conference agreement would, for example, prevent a labor organization from seeking to compel an employer to hire only union foremen or to discharge foremen who were not members of the union, and in this respect it covers matters which, among others, were dealt with under section 12 of the House bill.

13. Section 8 (b) (4) of the conference agreement has been expanded to cover a matter which was covered by section 12 of the House bill, namely, concerted activity by a union or its agents to compel an employer or self-employed person to become a member.

Two additional unfair labor practices are added which were not contained in the Senate amendment but were contained in the House bill. The first would make it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents having in effect a permitted union shop or maintenance of membership agreement to require the payment of an initiation fee in an amount which the Board finds excessive or discriminatory under all the circumstances.

14. A similar provision, though broader in its scope, was contained in section 8 (c) (2) of the amended Labor Act in the House bill. It is also made an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents to cause or attempt to cause an employer to pay any money or thing of value, in the nature of an exaction, for services which are not performed or not to be performed. This provision derives from the provisions of the House bill relating to "featherbedding" practices.

15. The conference agreement adopts the provisions of the House bill in this respect with one change derived from the Senate amendment.

16. Section 8 (c) of the House bill contained detailed provisions dealing with the relations of labor organizations with their members. One of the more important provisions of this section—that limiting the initiation fees which a labor organization may impose where a permitted union shop or maintenance-of-membership agreement is in effect—is included in the conference agreement (sec. 8 (b) (5)) and has already been discussed. The other parts of this subsection are omitted from the conference agreement as unfair labor practices, but section 9 (f) (6) of the conference agreement requires labor organizations to make periodic reports with respect to many of these matters as a condition of certification and other benefits under the act.

17. The conference agreement, in section 9 (b), contains one further provision covering a particular classification of employees who were dealt with in the House bill in the definition of "supervisor."

18. Under section 9 (f) (3) in the House bill it was provided that, in determining whether a unit is appropriate for collective bargaining, the extent to which employees had organized should not be controlling. There was no comparable provision in the Senate amendment. The conference agreement, in section 9 (c), contains this provision of the House bill.

19. The "ever has been" test that was included in the House bill is omitted from the conference agreement as unnecessary, since the Supreme Court has held that if an individual has been proved to be a member of the Communist Party at some time in the past, the presumption is that he is still a member in the absence of proof to the contrary.

20. The particular problem dealt with in this latter clarification was provided for in the House bill by the requirement that only certified bargaining agents could make union-shop agreements and petition for elections to authorize their execution.

21. Third, there are added to the matters, with respect to which information must be filed, detailed statements of, or reference to, the provisions of the organization's constitution and bylaws, showing the procedure followed with respect to most of the matters which were covered in section 8 (c) in the House bill (the section dealing with the relations between labor organizations and their members).

22. Section 10 (b) of the amended act under the House bill contemplated that, in unfair practice cases, the Administrator would investigate charges, issue complaints, and prosecute cases. The Senate amendment did not contain comparable provisions. As previously noted, the conference agreement contemplates that these duties will be performed under the exclusive and independent direction of the General Counsel of the Board, an official appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

23. The House bill provided, in section 10 (b), that proceedings before the Board should be conducted, so far as practicable, in accordance with the rules of evidence applicable in the district courts of the United States under the rules of civil procedure.

24. The conference agreement in section 10 (c) contains this provision of the House bill.

In section 10 (c) the House bill provided that the Board should base its decisions upon the weight of the evidence. The Senate amendment retained the present language of the act, permitting the Board to rest its orders upon all the testimony taken. The conference agreement provides that the Board shall act only on the preponderance of the testimony—that is to say, on the weight of the credible evidence.

25. The House bill also included, in section 10 (c) of the amended act, a provision forbidding the Board to order reinstatement or back pay for any employee who had been suspended or discharged, unless the weight of the evidence showed that the employee was not suspended or discharged for cause. The Senate amendment contained no corresponding provision. The conference agreement omits the weight-of-evidence language, since the Board, under the general provisions of section 10, must act on a preponderance of evidence, and simply provides that no order of the Board shall require reinstatement or back pay for any individual who was suspended or discharged for cause.

26. The House bill provided that in proceedings under section 10 a proposed report and recommended order would be filed by the person conducting the hearing on behalf of the Board, and that the recommended order would become final if not excepted to within 20 days. The Senate amendment did not contain any comparable provision. The conference agreement adopts the language in section 10 (c) in the House bill in this respect.

27. The conference agreement follows the provisions of existing law and the Senate amendment with the addition thereto of provisions requiring the issuance of subpenas as a matter of course on the request of any party, as was provided in the House bill.

28. Many of the matters covered in section 12 of the House bill are also covered in the conference agreement in different form, as has been pointed out above in the discussion of section 7 and section 8 (b) (1) of the conference agreement.

29. To make certain that there should be no question about this, section 13 was included in the House bill. The conference agreement, in section 14 (b), contains a provision having the same effect.

30. One important duty of the Director which was not included in the Senate amendment is included in the conference agreement and is derived from the provisions of the House bill providing for a secret ballot by employees upon their employer's last offer of settlement before resorting to strike. Under the conference agreement it is the duty of the Director, if he is not able to bring the parties to agreement by conciliation within a reasonable time, to seek to induce them to seek other means of settling the dispute, including submission to the employees in the bargaining unit of the employer's last offer of settlement for refusal or for approval or rejection in a secret ballot. While the vote on the employer's last offer by secret ballot is not compulsory as it was in the House bill, it is expected that this procedure will be extensively used.

31. Section 302 of the House bill and section 301 of the Senate amendment contained provisions relating to suits by and against labor organizations in the courts of the United States. The conference agreement follows in general the provisions of the House bill with changes therein hereafter noted.

32. The conference agreement follows these provisions of the House bill except that this subsection is made applicable to labor organizations which represent employees in an industry affecting commerce and to employers whose activities affect commerce, as later defined.

33. Section 302 (c) of the House bill contained provisions describing the venue of suits to which labor organizations were parties and section 302 (d) provided for the manner of service of process upon labor organizations. These provisions of the House bill appear unchanged as section 301 (c) and (d) of the conference agreement.

34. Section 302 (e) of the House bill made the Norris-LaGuardia Act inapplicable in actions and proceedings involving violations of agreements between an employer and a labor organization. Only part of this provision is included in the conference agreement. Section 6 of the Norris-LaGuardia Act provides that no employer or labor organization participating or interested in a labor dispute shall be held responsible for the unlawful acts of their agents except upon clear proof of actual authorization of such acts, or ratification of such acts after actual knowledge thereof. This provision in the Norris-LaGuardia Act was made inapplicable under the House bill. Section 301 (e) of the conference agreement provides that for the purposes of section 301 in determining whether any person is acting as an agent of another so as to make such other person responsible for his actions, the question of whether the specific acts performed were actually authorized or subsequently ratified shall not be controlling.

35. The conference agreement adopts the provisions of the House bill, with one change.

36. Section 207 of the House bill made it unlawful for any employee of the United States to strike against the Government. Violations of this section were to be punishable by immediate discharge, forfeiture of all rights of reemployment, forfeiture of civil-service status, and forefeiture of all benefits which the individual had acquired by virtue of his Government employment. The conference agreement, in section 305, makes it unlawful for any individual employed by the United States or any agency thereof (including wholly owned Government corporations) to participate in any strike against the Government. Violations are to be punishable by immediate discharge and forfeiture of civil-service status, if any, and the individual is not to be eligible for employment by the United States for 3 years.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in Heaven, who knowest all and lovest all, mercifully hear our supplication. As each day brings new duties, may we waste no time on lost opportunities, but turn the leaf of another day and behold the page with confidence and assurance. Remind us that whatsoever we sow that shall we also reap; like falling grain, it revives and springs again. We pray Thee to give hope and purpose to our labors, lest weary human flesh sow but little and have naught else. Humble our pride and disturb our overconfidence. When we are selfish, forgive; when we wander astray, recall; and when we think ill of others, do Thou restrain. O lift us to those lofty tablelands of the soul against which the storm may beat in vain. Be unto us a shaft of light breaking through the clouds, and those who have sown in tears shall reap in joy.

Grant Thy blessings of comfort, safety, and good health upon our President and his household.

In the Saviour's name we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, Republicans everywhere should join in singing the Doxology.

A reporter asked Henry Wallace in Raleigh, N. C., yesterday if he would support the Republican Party in 1948, and Mr. Wallace replied that he could not imagine himself campaigning for a Republican under any circumstances.

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREHM. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. He also said that he would not support Harry Truman, so we will also join in the Doxology.

COMMUNISM IN EUROPE

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday President Truman very rightly condemned the steal of Hungary by the Communists. I am sure every American joins him in that protest. But, Mr. Speaker, I have been listening a long, long time to hear that same kind of protest concerning the steal of Poland, the steal of Estonia, the steal of Latvia, and the steal of Lithuania. Such a protest, Mr. Speaker, is long overdue.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN DENOUNCES COMMUNISM IN EUROPE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, first I desire to compliment President Truman for denouncing the Communists taking over Hungary. It is now in order to denounce their taking over Bulgaria.

I also desire to join the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SMITH] in saying that I should like to see him do the same thing with reference to every other country that has been overrun by the Communist Party in Europe which is dominated by a minority racial group that is perpetrating the most sadistic brutality ever known on the innocent people of Russia, Hungary, Poland, and every other country they have overrun.

I say it is time for the American people, with the President leading the way, to break relations with every Communist controlled country in the world and let it be known that we will not do business with any gangster government on earth. I will not only join him in that fight, but I will contribute every ounce of energy I have to driving communism from our shores, and encouraging the people of Europe to restore self-government and free themselves from the criminal persecution to which they are now subjected at the hands of the sadistic racial minority which now dominates them from Moscow.

In that way we can free our own country of this communistic filth and at the same time encourage the Christian nations of Europe to free themselves from the most cruel system of brutality and slavery this world has ever known.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the consideration of House Resolution 224.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. JACKSON].

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, during the few short months I have been a Member of this distinguished body there have been a great many matters of legislation about which misrepresentation, much abuse, and many misstatements have been made. However, I feel that in the case of the so-called Voice of America perhaps more has been said in error than upon any other single piece of legislation with which I have been associated. It is perhaps one of the most misunderstood pieces of legislation that this House has had under consideration for several months.

The United States of America has but one commodity for sale in the markets of the world. That commodity is a way of life. It is, if you please, a way of freedom. It is what we have come to know as the American way. We have nothing else to sell. We do not seek to be aggressors. We do not seek the acquisition of the lands or the rights of other peoples. We have but one item to sell and that item is the truth about how we live in this country. Oppression and tyranny are riding throughout the world. The peoples of the other nations of the earth are largely in intellectual darkness. Those who rule them are determined that they shall not come to know a better way of life or better conditions of living. It is this situation that the so-called Mundt bill proposes to meet with positive and aggressive action. It is proposed that we carry a message of hope into darkness, that we light the lamps of knowledge, and that we give the other peoples of the earth something to look forward to besides oppression and tyranny.

Much has been said about the personalities connected with this program. Much has been said about the inefficiency of operation; about the poor selection of material to be broadcast. But actually, for an operation of this magnitude, for an operation which has continued unabated for some 20 months, there have been very, very few instances in which serious errors have been made. Personally, I think the broadcasting feature of the program has been overstressed. Actually the Voice of America, as that term pertains to the radio broadcasts, is but a small feature of the measure now under consideration. There are a great many other aspects. There is the aspect of the exchange of students, the aspect of the exchange of professors on a reciprocal basis.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of California. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I want to ask a question about these broadcasts. Is there any provision in this bill for Congress to see copies of these broadcasts and to know what is being broadcast to Europe? I know some people, even on the Federal pay roll, that I would not risk to tell what America is doing and what the people of this country think. I think there ought to be a provision for everyone of these broadcasts to be filed with the Congress of the United States.

Mr. JACKSON of California. I am quite certain that copies of the broadcasts are available upon request, or could be sent upon request.

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of California. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BREHM. How about the reception sets in the other countries. Are they permitted to listen in on our broadcasts?

Mr. JACKSON of California. As far as we have been able to determine from the testimony given before the subcommittee on this bill, there is no restriction at the present time upon the short-wave receivers.

Mr. BREHM. Even in Russia?

Mr. JACKSON of California. Not even in Russia. Naturally, I do not know exactly how many but hundreds of thousands of persons listen to the Voice of America broadcasts.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of California. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Under this bill do we get teachers from Russia to come over here and teach in our colleges, universities, and schools?

Mr. JACKSON of California. There is written into the bill the proviso that all exchange of students and professors must be on a reciprocal basis and that if any professor, student, or any other person receiving benefits under this act engages in political activity or activities detrimental to the best interests of the United States they shall be deported.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes; but we never deport them.

Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the Governor of Idaho.

The resolution was agreed to

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, prompted by what was said on the floor here this morning prior to the call of the roll, I wish to observe that in my official career I have proceeded upon the belief that no man in public life was entitled to a private opinion on a public question. As a result of following that course I have often found myself at war with others but always at peace with myself.

Mr. Speaker, I get a great deal of comfort out of witnessing the change of feeling that has come over official America. But I would like to say that it is going to take more than protests and denunciation to cure the evils in the making, of which we are in part responsible. The policy of appeasement that we too long pursued has resulted in the creation of a force that has all the world, with the exception of ourselves, trembling in their boots. I want to see positive action taken—a proving of faith by deeds. Promises are not sufficient.

Mr. Speaker, a great deal of good, in my opinion, is going to come out of the situation brought about by the Appropriations Committee in refusing to make appropriation for the particular activity with which we are concerned in the consideration of the pending resolution. The committee probably based their action upon the ground that no legislative authority existed for the making of the appropriation, but I suspect that the controlling thing which influenced the action of the committee was the lack of confidence that the committee had in the administration of this program.

Mr. Speaker, I was one of those who some time ago attacked this particular activity of the State Department, and I think there was abundant justification for the position that we took at that time. I must say, however, that the picture has completely changed in the past several months and that the agency in the State Department carrying on this work is an entirely different group, in the main, from what it was when the State Department took over following the passing out of the OWI.

I am convinced that this is an activity which the security and the welfare of our country demand we carry on. It is not propaganda in the sense that we are endeavoring to mislead or to bring about an attitude false to the best interests of other people; it is something that we must do to make ourselves understood, to meet and to resist the campaign, world-wide in character, that is being waged mainly against the United States by Soviet Russia.

Let me say at this point that England, as unfavorable as her economic situation happens to be, is at this time expending between forty and forty-five million dollars in her informational program. The amount of money that is being requested by the State Department is, in my opinion, insufficient to carry on this informational program in the manner that it should be conducted, but will suffice to keep it going. I know what is troubling the membership of this House. Members are not so much against the continuation of the program as they are against the personnel which has been carrying on the program. They have the fear that people who are too far to the left are being used—people who are more interested in reform than in telling the story of America.

Much of the criticism against the State Department's international information program centers around its administration, and thus around the man responsible for its execution—William Benton, Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs. Criticism of Mr. Benton, I believe, is wholly unjustified, and altogether unfair. In my opinion it would be difficult to find a man better qualified, in his business background, previous experience, ability as an organizer, and in his talents for leadership to head this vitally important Government activity than Bill Benton. One of the most successful independent businessmen in the country, and with an equally impressive record of achievement in education, Bill Benton, during the past 2 years, has done a remarkable pioneering job, in organizing and directing the Government's program to tell to the world the story of the United States.

Bill Benton has a thoroughly American background. His father, a professor at the University of Minnesota, died when he was a boy of 10, and his mother moved to a Montana homestead, following the spirit and example of the pioneers who built America. There followed a period that was tough for both the mother and the children. But hard work and the pioneer spirit prevailed. His mother later became a well-known and successful teacher, and the boy went to the Shattuck Academy, in Minnesota, and afterward to Yale University, where he graduated with the class of 1921.

From 1922 to 1936, Benton was in the advertising-agency business. In this he made a spectacular success, directing many large advertising campaigns, and pioneering in the use of radio in advertising.

At 35, having accumulated a substantial fortune, he decided to retire from the advertising business. In 1937 he accepted a vice presidency of the University of Chicago, on a 6 months-per-year basis. At the University of Chicago, his main activities were in developing new instruments of education, particularly broadcasting, motion pictures, and publications. At the suggestion of Benton, the University of Chicago acquired the Encyclopaedia Britannica, Inc., and, in 1943, he became chairman of the Encyclopaedia Britannica board. Under his leadership, the Britannica expanded into the field of classroom motion pictures through its subsidiary, Encyclopaedia Britannica Films, Inc.

During his free 6 months' period, Benton participated in founding the Committee for Economic Development, of which he was vice chairman until he came to the State Department. He played a vitally important part in directing the work of the Committee for Economic Development, which had the support and participation of many of the country's leading businessmen and industrialists.

Benton also had other business interests. He acquired ownership of several small companies in the fields of music publishing, broadcasting service, and wired music, the key company of which is the Muzak Corp.

Mr. Benton's success as a businessman is evidenced by his record of building up the capital value of the companies he owns. Since 1937, with a capital investment of less than $250,000, these companies have been so successful under his direction that their capital value today is estimated at close to $10,000,000.

In August 1945 Benton was appointed Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs. In accepting this post he gave up all his outside interests involving operating responsibilities.

Benton faced a gigantic and challenging job in the State Department. It included the direction of the work of the State Department in projecting to foreign peoples a full and fair picture of American life and of the aims and policies of the United States Government, helping to develop in the American people a closer understanding of the problems and policies in the field of foreign affairs, and responsibility for United States participation in the United States Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization.

I doubt if any man in the executive departments has worked harder than Bill Benton during the past 2 years. He averages 12 or 14 hours a day on the job. Benton has labored continually to improve the personnel in his organization, and increase the efficiency of the operations for which he is responsible. The evidence that has accumulated speaks eloquently of the success achieved by the international information service in combating misrepresentations of the United States, and telling the facts about this country and its policies. Equally impressive is the evidence of the need for continuing, over a long period, the Department's information program as an essential arm of our foreign policy.

At this point I should like to insert the following telegram received by a number of Members of Congress. The telegram, which speaks for itself, is as follows:

As trustees of the University of Chicago we have worked closely with William Benton for many pears as vice president of the university and later as a trustee. As head of Encyclopaedia Britannica and Britannica Films as well as other business interests Benton is one of the very successful independent businessmen in the country. His business experience together with his background in education—8 years as vice president of the University of Chicago—his success in publishing and in educational motion pictures and radio, in our opinion qualified Benton in an unusual way to administer the international information services and cultural program.

This telegram was signed by John Nuveen, Jr., Nuveen & Co.; Dr. Robert E. Wilson, chairman of the board, Standard Oil Co., Indiana; Frank Sulzberger, president, Enterprise Paint Manufacturing Co.; Graham Aldis, Aldis & Co.; Edward Eagle Brown, chairman of the board, First National Bank, Chicago; Harold H. Swift, vice chairman of the board, Swift & Co.; Walter P. Paepcke, chairman of the board, Container Corp. of America; Paul C. Russell, president, Harris Trust & Savings Bank.

I should also like to insert excerpts from a letter published in the Washington Post, May 17, signed by five men closely associated with Mr. Benton in various civic activities.

The kind of criticism that is now being leveled at Bill Benton is the kind of thing that keeps responsible and able people from going into Government work. It may be an effort to save face on the part of those who questioned the need for OIC. The sudden decision that the operation is important but that there must be something the matter with Benton is an old and familiar pattern in Government and one that we protest in this case. Benton's record as a businessman and an administrator is well known to those in the business community.

He is one of the most successful independent businessmen in the United States; one of us can speak with special authority on this subject, because Mr. Hoffman serves as a member of the board of directors of the Encyclopaedia Britannica and of Britannica Films and knows of the extraordinary progress these companies made under Benton's leadership in the last 5 years.

He combines with this business experience a background in education (8 years as vice president of the University of Chicago), in broadcasting, in publishing, and in educational motion pictures. He has experience, skill, and enthusiasm, and he has an Americanism rooted in his boyhood in Minnesota and Montana that has found expression in every phase of his thinking and his career.

Bill Benton is the top man in the country for this job. It would be difficult indeed to find anyone who matches his initial qualifications for administering America's international information and cultural program. And it would be tragic, for the sake of a political maneuver, to waste the 20 months of experience he has acquired in mastering an assignment that is as new and unfamiliar to our country as it is necessary.

Signers of the letter were Paul G. Hoffman, president, Studebaker Corp.; Ralph E. Flanders, United States Senate; Eric A. Johnston, president, Motion Picture Association; Walter D. Fuller, president, Curtis Publishing Co.; Marion B. Folsom, treasurer, Eastman Kodak Co.

I know Bill Benton personally, and have the utmost confidence in his competency to direct the activities of the State Department for which he is responsible. I do not think General Marshall could find a better qualified man for the job. The country needs a vigorous and efficient international information program, and I believe there are many Members of Congress who share my hope that General Marshall will retain Bill Benton as the directing head of this State Department agency.

We have at the head of the State Department the best man that came out of the war. He is not only a great soldier; he is a great statesman, and probably enjoys a larger measure of public confidence than any other living American; and given a free hand, as I believe he is being given, he will make a record unsurpassed in the field of statecraft and diplomacy.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Now then, just waving aside the program of telling the world about the United States, you provide here for the interchange of instructors. Does the gentleman know that communism is being spread in the educational institutions of America largely by those foreign immigrant professors who come in here for that purpose?

Mr. COX. I am not combatting the charge——

Mr. RANKIN. And we are simply augmenting that policy in this bill.

Mr. COX. Let me say to the gentleman that the bill provides for a screening of personnel, not only by the FBI, in whom everyone has confidence, but by the security group within the State Department that performs quite as efficiently as does the FBI.

Mr. RANKIN. But it does not screen the ones they send us. We screen the ones we send them, but the poison is being spread by the ones that have flooded in here and are now teaching in educational institutions of America, spreading communism among American students.

Mr. COX. This whole matter revolves around the question: How much confidence have you in General Marshall?

Mr. RANKIN. I have confidence in no man sufficient to authorize him to open the floodgates to a lot of Communists to come here and mislead the children of this country. But, remember, General Marshall does not screen the ones coming here from behind the "iron curtain."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BUSBEY. The gentleman now addressing the House has the reputation for being fair and honest second to none, and I am sure that he does not want anything to be in the RECORD that is not absolutely true. If I recall right, he made the statement that they have an entirely new set-up down there.

Mr. COX. I said in the main.

Mr. BUSBEY. And that they have gotten rid of this OWI crowd.

Mr. COX. In large part. The OWI personnel has been eliminated in large part. There were many good and very able people connected with OWI and a few of those are still being used.

Mr. BUSBEY. I would like to say for the gentleman's information that I hold in my hand a photostatic copy of the personnel records of this group in Paris, France. They have nine people. Six of the nine are still hold-overs of the old OWI crowd in Paris.

Mr. COX. If there are undesirable people still in the State Department can we not and should we not, rely upon General Marshall to get rid of them? That is my feeling about this question. I indulge the profound conviction that we would make a grievous mistake if we did not authorize this appropriation and continue the foreign informational service that is now being carried on.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. General Marshall will not have anything in the world to say about the professors that are sent here from Europe any more than he has to say about the ones that are in here now, as I said, poisoning the minds of the students of this Nation.

Mr. COX. Let me say that I have a different opinion of General Marshall. He is no painted front, he is in the State Department to run it, and he is going to run it if he performs as I am confident he will. It is his responsibility to chase out of the Department the little and bad people still remaining there and thus recapture for the Department the confidence of Congress and the country which it should enjoy.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JUDD. Does not the gentleman know that the committee wrote in on page 3 beginning in line 21 this sentence:

If the Secretary finds that any person from another country, while in the United States pursuant to this section, is engaged in activities of a political nature or in activities not consistent with the security of the United States, the Secretary shall promptly report such finding to the Attorney General, and such person shall be promptly deported.

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman from Minnesota had gone through the hearings we have, he would find how hard it is to pin that label on these Reds who are today teaching in some of our schools and spreading communism throughout the United States.

Mr. JUDD. We do not say if they are members, we say if they are advocating things not consistent with our security they shall be deported.

Mr. COX. Russia is on the air 24 hours out of the day disseminating false information about the United States. Are we to sit silently by and see this continue? Are we to deny ourselves the right and privilege to tell our own story, to interpret our own acts, and to draw a picture of our own national life? I trust that you will not permit your afore-taken opinions to hold in the light of the record that was made by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. They had before them the present Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Harriman, who was formerly Ambassador to Russia; General Smith, the present Ambassador to Russia; General Marshall, and General Eisenhower, all of whom were unanimous in the opinion that this activity is essential as a part of the foreign program of the State Department.

On the question of the merits of the bill, consideration of which the pending rule makes in order, Secretary Harriman, who was formerly Ambassador to Russia, testified before the Committee on Foreign Affairs as follows:

Certainly it is a fact that with our world trade running to imports and exports substantially in excess of $20,000,000,000, it is essential to our commercial interests to have America understood, its life, the quality of its workmanship and the quality of its products, follow a general sympathy for a nation and its objectives.

In terms of percentages of this approximately $20,000,000,000, I think it is not an exaggeration to say that the total appropriations asked for is something like one one-thousandth of the sum that I have been speaking of, so that I believe that from only the commercial aspect it will be justified, but, as I say, the commercial aspects are secondary to the other objectives.

As I say, there were two fundamental misunderstandings about America and that was due to the fact, naturally, that the normal channels of commercial news cover the things that are bought by the British publications, and the British people are like us, they like sensational news, they like something which is stimulating and interesting to read, and such part of the limited British press rather tended to emphasize such things as our strikes. At that time there was already an inflationary spiral of price increases.

I assure you that the British people got the impression that we were in more or less a chaotic economic condition. If there was a riot in connection with a strike, naturally that was news.

The other misunderstanding came from the drive that was on in the United States to get food for Europe and the hungry areas. In addition to that there had been the fact that we had gone off rations. It was of great interest to the British people, because they were on rations. The things that were said in the press at that time, encouraging the people to cooperate in making food available to take care of the hungry areas was naturally published.

Therefore the impression you would get, the general impression of the cautious reader, would be that America was in an economic chaotic condition and that we are living in greed and that we were not thinking of any of the suffering that existed anywhere in the world.

I cannot state too fully my opinion that this program is an essential part of our foreign program and without monitoring what other people say against us, without stating on an affirmative basis what our objectives are, what our principles are, what life is in America, our reputation can only suffer.

There has been a good deal said about some individuals here, there, or the other place. My impression is, from where I have seen them, not only in Moscow and London but in my travels around, that the men we have abroad on this service are a very high type, high quality, and balanced kind, and as many newspapermen are, they know how to work and they work overtime and long hours.

We are inadequately staffed everywhere but those people have enthusiasm for their work and morale is good. We have many high-quality people. I mention Dr. Nevins and I assume you would know of him, as an example of the quality of our representatives on the other side.

However, the flow of information back to the State Department is a very important aspect of our work and it is of very great importance to our political negotiators in terms of knowing how to deal with critical questions that come up.

When General Smith, now Ambassador to Russia, was before the committee he testified, in part, as follows:

General SMITH. I would like to say, by way of preamble to you and to the other members of the committee, that, of course, I am competent to speak on this very important question only from the point of view of an American representative to the Soviet Union, and my knowledge of the broadcasting program now being conducted by the State Department is limited to that part of it which is directed toward the Soviet Union.

In that particular phase we have had, and continue to have, the most intense interest, because we think it is a vitally important thing.

I see it this way: Those of you who visited Europe as the guests of our headquarters after the war, and some of you who traveled with me, will realize that as a result of the aftermath of the war the people of central Europe are in a state of mental confusion, mental and physical depression, the like of which it is impossible for the average American to imagine. They do not know which way to turn. The political ideologies on which they have pinned their faith in the past have proved false. They are groping for a ray of light and they are susceptible to almost any form of propaganda that will offer them something in the way of hope for the future.

This country has a commodity to sell which is in demand everywhere in the world, and that is a democracy which we have proved to ourselves, by experiment and experience, provides a decent way of life for the average citizen; provides a basic respect for human liberty and for the rights of the individual. That is something for which there is a crying demand everywhere in the world.

I have heard it said that democracy should sell itself by its own basic transcendant value, and without advertising. That is a theory of "the man who builds a better mousetrap" type. I do not know whether this theory actually works in the present day, when all sorts of political ideologies, some of which are not acceptable to us, are attempting to sell themselves by much more forceful means and by direct advertising.

You could not sell soap without advertising, and I do not believe that you can sell any other commodity, even one which is in as great demand as the American brand of democracy.

In Europe the air is filled for 24 hours a day with recommendations of various brands of political ideologies that we think are inferior to the commodity that we have to offer. And I submit most respectfully that if we remain silent in the face of this flood of advertising we simply will turn over the groping peoples of Europe to forces which are not entirely compatible with the way of life that we consider desirable and representative of real democracy and human freedom and human dignity.

We do not intend, nor do we wish, to set up any invidious comparisons between our country and any other country, but we do think that it is desirable that the citizens of the rest of the world understand our way of life, how our people live, how they go to school, what the farmer does, what the workingman does, and understand definitely that our people believe in peace; that we are working hard for peace; that we are striving to implement the only agency we see capable of bringing about a condition of world peace—the United Nations; and that the efforts we make to help people elsewhere in the world are not selfish and are not based on political imperialism, but are genuinely altruistic.

Mr. JUDD. You are willing to say on the record that on the whole these programs have been effective in giving more information, and a more accurate picture of America?

General SMITH. Indeed I do, and they will continue to be effective, increasingly effective, as the technical difficulties inherent in broadcasting the vast distance involved are overcome, and as the programs are revised and improved to appeal to the tastes of the Soviet listener.

Mr. JUDD. When I asked about more and better programs, I had in mind also mechanical standards.

General SMITH. I would like to point out that it took a long time for the BBC to build up the present audience and their reputation for credibility. As matter of fact, it took them many months to whip the technical difficulties involved in broadcasting to eastern Europe. I have been interested in noting that our own people have overcome to a large extent those difficulties in an infinitely shorter time. We have profited by the mistakes that the BBC made, and our technical people have been very good. I should say if we graph the relative excellence of our broadcasts, ours would go up in a sweeping curve like this just in a matter of weeks, whereas the BBC took a long time to accomplish the same results. It will take us a long time, too, to raise our program to the level we want to attain. We cannot expect to do this in a matter of months. It has to be a continuing program, and we have to approach it intelligently and objectively. I say again that I agree with you, that an honest, uncolored, straightforward presentation of our ideals seems to me, not knowing very much about it, the best approach. I have never liked to think of these present broadcasts at all as propaganda. I do not consider them propaganda. We are simply telling our story.

General SMITH. I am not a regular member of the State Department. I belong by profession by another one, and I must state quite frankly here that I think the job has been extremely well done. I have been surprised. As a professional soldier, you know, we do not always throw flowers at the diplomats. It is not in our military tradition to do so, but I must say they have tackled this thing; and I think as far as the Russian broadcasts are concerned, they have tackled it amazingly well.

In Moscow we sit in and listen. I have this sort of informal advisory board. The press is included. We are a small family. There are not too many Americans in Moscow, and we hang together pretty well. The corps of correspondents there are practically the same as members of the family.

Mr. JARMAN. In view of my agreement that not only a cross section of our country and the events which occurred in it should be presented on this program, but also that it should be an absolutely accurate picture, and uncolored, it naturally follows that I also agree that whenever an isolated lynching occurs in the South it should be referred to, because we have so very few down there that the references will be so few and far between that it would not do our country any harm.

General SMITH. There is no reason, Mr. Congressman, why we should not tell the truth about it. The Soviet press is well represented in this country. TASS has an able corps of reporters and correspondents, and they report back to the Soviet Union. They cover the news well over here. If we did not make reference to things like that, which appear normally as items of American news to the Soviet press, we would lose out.

Furthermore, take the last lynching. The important thing to inform the Soviet citizens about is that while there was a lynching the most determined efforts were made by the State and Federal Governments to bring the perpetrators of the atrocity to trial. They are being tried. The fact that they are being tried should be recorded and should be made known to the Soviet Union. Otherwise, the Soviet citizens would gain the impression that whenever there is a lynching reported there is a corpse hanging from every lamppost and nothing whatever is done.

Let me quote from testimony given by General Eisenhower.

General Eisenhower testified:

On the other hand, through the war I and all of my associates were constantly struck by the appalling ignorance that exists throughout the world about the United States; things that we take so much for granted that we do not even think about them are completely unknown to much of the world.

* * * * *

I have this theory, sir. I believe that most of you here would agree with me that we instinctively trust nations in which the power resides in the hands of people, because we believe that people do not want wars.

Therefore, I feel that the more the advantages of that type of government are spread throughout the world the more likely it will be that that system is followed by other countries, many of which are now trembling in the balance. They do not know which way to go.

If they can find out what we believe to be the advantages of our system, they should, and we believe that they would, go along in that line. The more that that system is practiced throughout the world, certainly the fewer will be the potential aggressors in the world, and as a result the more secure we will be. There is where I come into the picture.

To my mind, the more democracy is practiced in the world the more secure we are, and therefore the less we would have to pour into armies and navies, and such other sterile organizations that produce nothing for this country.

Therefore, in my opinion there is this field that must not be neglected, in the exchange of students and the getting out of facts. I do mean facts about the standards of living we have in this country and our workmen, in terms of dollars, necessarily. I think it ought to go out in terms of ice boxes, radios, cars, how much did they have to eat, what they wear, when they get to go to sports spectacles, and what they have available in the way of art galleries and things like that.

I think there is no field that can be neglected. However, the organization you need, and the technique, there I must say I am not only ignorant; it is not my business.

Mr. LODGE. Thank you very much, General.

I assume that you also feel that living as we are now in a period of conflict, though not at war, this program has an even greater significance than it would have in a normal period of peace?

General EISENHOWER. I most certainly do. I believe in the positive program of trying to lead the world toward democratic forms of life and I do not see how you are going to do it unless they have the knowledge with which to make their own conclusions and decisions.

Mr. MANSFIELD. General, I am very glad to hear your whole-hearted and outspoken approval of a program of this sort.

Now in your opinion, if we are going to pour dollars into different countries throughout the world to feed people, and necessarily so, do you think it would be a necessary corollary to implement that policy as well as to implement the policy of aid to Greece and Turkey, to at the same time bring the true story of America to as many people as we possibly can so they will understand what we stand for? Truth is the best propaganda.

General EISENHOWER. I believe it so thoroughly, sir, that to my mind there is nothing to argue about.

I can see no significant reason that you could bring to bear against that general proposition.

Now the facts of history—though not all of them—would lead these people to give us the trust that we should like to have; in spite of some unpleasing aspects of our past, we do honestly believe in the purity of our motives today, and therefore I think that it is another region in which education throughout the world is necessary.

We are going to use our power, our influence and our wealth to lift people up and to give them a chance to live their own lives. If we are to do that they must know the facts about the country on which they are depending.

Therefore, as I say, the only thing we can do is put out the truth about it, and I do not believe in doing it in an antagonistic manner. I do not believe we should challenge anybody in this world.

My theory is that we can all live peacefully together if we will each have a little sense, but truth is the important thing to help us develop some sense, all of us.

As I see it, if you go into this thing, you must go into it on a basis of a long-term proposition.

As I say, it is not merely the beaming out of facts. I would encourage the exchange of students, of scientists, of doctors, of instructors, of even theologians; anything you could think of that would tend to carry back into these various countries an understanding of what we are doing and just how we live, and we, in turn, getting some clearer idea of why people act thus and so. We think we offer a reasonable proposition, for example, in the atomic bomb. We think we are very reasonable. Others do not seem to think so. Why? What is the background of it? Because the more you understand these difficulties, the better will be our own programs in turn.

I believe it should go in the fields of art, science, and everything. Everything educational.

I would consider the use of just what you would call publicity, or let us say the propaganda phase of it, if you want to use that word, as a mere part of the whole program. Possibly not all of it needs to be Government-supported.

If we can get our great colleges, institutions, and foundations of that kind interested in this thing we will improve all the way through.

Therefore, I would say that you could not expect to reach those people very quickly, and on a very broad base at first.

There is another thing we know, that science will constantly bring to us easier and better ways of getting information. One day it will practically be impossible for the Government to say, "You may not have a radio that will pick up anything but a particular wave length," because science will go so far that anyone can learn what someone else is saying on that radio.

Mr. JUDD. I think the question that has caused more discussion, not only in this committee but in the Congress, and perhaps all through the country, is the question of personnel. There is little disagreement as to the need for some such program, and the importance of it. Three things are essential to its success: A sound plan, money, and then men to administer. The biggest question is the kind and quality of the men to administer it.

Have you had kick-backs, favorable or unfavorable, from the type of personnel that has been working in this program in the various countries abroad?

General EISENHOWER. There has been no word of criticism come to me. I will go out personally and voluntarily and vouch for people that I have been with in periods of stress and strain, and I will say that if General Marshall cannot pick the right kind of people, then I do not know who can.

Mr. JUDD. General Smith told us, and we had read in the paper about one man in the Embassy in Moscow who did not come up to specifications.

General EISENHOWER. He fired him, too.

Mr. JUDD. I know it. You have not heard of other cases of that sort?

General EISENHOWER. No. If they found someone who was not operating, they would get rid of them.

Mr. JUDD. Have you had any reports that said, "Over in the Embassy one of the State Department men is a so-and-so, and causing more trouble than he is doing good, and we wish that he could be eliminated"?

General EISENHOWER. I cannot recall any specific instance, but I have had many others of exactly the contrary type, where heads of our mission and people working with our military people in places like Russia, Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, and so on, they stated exactly the opposite, that they have a happy family, and they all work together.

Now let us see what General Marshall said. I quote from his testimony:

As I said some time ago, when I returned from China it was apparent to me that we had to take very definite action in order to have the United States and its purposes understood by the people generally in the world and that we had no conception here at home as to how little we were understood and to what degree we were misrepresented.

This bill would at least permit us to interpret ourselves to the world and have our motives better understood, and what we have done better comprehended.

I had an experience in propaganda in China which was very instructive, and it there became glaringly apparent to me that the only basis on which we could contend against such a procedure, which has become so common in this modern world, particularly as it developed, during the World War period, is by some method of spreading the truth abroad until people develop confidence in the fact that we are stating the truth.

The problem then is how that is to be done. There are different methods. The USIS is one method. Broadcasting is one method. The exchange of students and intellectuals and so on is another method, but all of them are very important to us as a people, and very, very important to the State Department in connection with our foreign policy.

I should say they are important to Congress, which has acted in a very generous manner toward the people of many countries and the world, and what it has done is little understood by those people who were the recipients.

I might say here, Mr. Chairman, that I would suggest that it would be a good thing to bring Mr. McNutt, our Ambassador to the Philippines, who just came back from Asia and Europe generally, and who was impressed with the great lack of knowledge and the seriousness of the misunderstandings of people generally as to just what the United States has done and what its intentions were.

It is very hard for us here at home to comprehend the degree to which our actions and purposes are not comprehended and the degree to which they are misrepresented.

I do not think any nation in the world has ever been more generous than the United States and I am rather inclined to think that no nation has ever received so little credit for that generosity.

However, that is our own fault, in my opinion. We have means to correct it and this law, if I understand it, is the authorization along that line. So long as propaganda is engaged in, we will be confronted by the necessity of taking some action ourselves.

I would be unalterably opposed to our following an ordinary propaganda procedure. I do not think it would be acceptable to the Congress and I am quite certain it would not be acceptable to the people and in line with our traditional thought on what is the right thing to do.

We cannot accept a negative attitude. And it cannot be, if it is to be successful, a hit-or-miss program.

Mr. Speaker, that is what these four distinguished Americans had to say on this subject. Whom can we better afford to rely upon than them?

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CHENOWETH].

Mr. CHENOWETH. Mr. Speaker, I hope that none of you will become unduly agitated or alarmed over this legislation. So far as I am able to ascertain, I doubt if any foreign country is going to sever relations with us if this bill fails to pass. This is not quite as serious as some would have you believe.

I am sure you enjoyed the remarks of my good friend and distinguished colleague from Georgia who just preceded me. He is always very persuasive, but today I thought he was laboring under some difficulty, which was no doubt obvious to you also. I just do not think his heart was in this assignment of defending the Office of International Information and Cultural Affairs.

Mr. Speaker, there is considerable controversy over whether or not the United States Government should engage in the business of disseminating propaganda. I do not have the time to enter into that discussion with you this morning. Let us assume that in order to keep pace with some of the other nations we must engage in a propaganda campaign. Even then the present program cannot be justified. However, I have never been able to convince myself that we should copy the methods of other countries, or that we should now set up a propaganda agency in order to convince European nations we are their friends.

The idea of the Government operating a news agency is certainly most novel and extraordinary. Mr. Kent Cooper, executive director of the Associated Press, in criticizing this program, said, and I quote:

> Abhorrence of the Government going into the news business has been so ingrained into our national character that to legalize it is like amending the Constitution.
> The American Government, by entering the world-wide propaganda contest, is becoming involved in a vicious circle, in which some countries are carrying on news propaganda with some of the money they have obtained through American financial credits.

I cannot understand why any further proof of our friendship for European nations should be required. Hundreds of thousands of our finest young men have spilled their blood on the battlefields of Europe and thousands have lost their lives on European soil. The United States spent about $330,000,000,000 to win the last war. Since the war ended we have poured something like $12,000,000,000 more into the different European countries. Still there are those who contend that we must have a propaganda agency to convince those people that we are their friends and that we are really interested in their welfare.

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHENOWETH. I yield.

Mr. BUFFETT. With the United States pouring hundreds of millions of dollars into the various countries of Europe to finance their experiments in socialism, does not it seem a bit stupid after spending millions to urge that we are devoted to the principle of free enterprise? They are going to judge us by the money we are spending and not by our talks on the radio.

Mr. CHENOWETH. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHENOWETH. I yield briefly to the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. One of the things that disturbs me is that it seems as if we are going to import professors from behind the iron curtain to try to tell the students of America what a great country that is. I think it is dangerous.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHENOWETH. I yield briefly.

Mr. DONDERO. This program would be just about as useful to America as Robert Toombs of Georgia was to Jefferson Davis when he was in his cabinet and as Thaddeus Stevens of Pennsylvania was to Abraham Lincoln during the War Between the States. They injured rather than advanced their respective causes.

Mr. CHENOWETH. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I want to speak for a moment about the present program of the Office of International Information conducted by the Honorable William Benton, Assistant Secretary of State. It happens that I am chairman of a subcommittee of the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments charged with the responsibility of investigating expenditures in the State Department. I am not speaking now in my capacity as chairman of that committee, but merely as a Member of the House. Our committee has not completed its work. My observations are purely my own and I speak for no other member of the committee. However, I have formed some rather definite impressions about the manner in which money is being spent in the State Department. If you will look at the list of officials and branches of the State Department, as contained in the Congressional Directory, I am sure you will be surprised to note how rapidly these officers and agencies in the Department have multiplied.

It is quite a task, I assure you, to investigate the present expenditures in the State Department. I call the attention of the House to the fact that the State Department has grown since 1939 from a total of 5,421 employees at a cost of $17,122,000 to a total of 24,561 at a cost of $181,535,000. It is very apparent that this expansion of the State Department is abnormal, and that some reorganization is absolutely necessary.

The gentleman from Georgia has referred to General Marshall. All of us have the highest respect for General Marshall. However, General Marshall knows very little, in my opinion, of what is actually going on in the State Department. He has not had and does not now have the time for details. He was in Moscow, you recall, for a couple of months, and has been back just a short time. It is physically impossible for the Secretary of State, regardless of who he may be, to personally supervise the different activities of that Department. He must rely on what others tell him.

I have come to the conclusion, after Mr. Benton appeared before our committee for a couple of days, that he is spending too much money on this cultural program. I refer particularly to the broadcasts in foreign languages. I have had a committee investigator check these activities in the New York office. From his reports I am convinced this program is too extravagant and could be carried on with much greater efficiency and economy.

Recently you heard my colleague from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] discuss the pictures that were sent abroad and which were described as works of art. These pictures were sent to Europe as samples of American art. I am sure all of you were disgusted with what you saw. Congress would be in an indefensible position if such projects are authorized by any bill we pass in this House. With reference to broadcasting, I think Mr. Benton has something like 600 people in New York, most of whom are engaged in the broadcasting program. I do not believe that such a staff is necessary. However, we have no assurance that there will be any retrenchment in case this bill is passed.

I am not satisfied that a propaganda agency should be established in the State Department. I raised this question when the Foreign Affairs Committee was before the Committee on Rules in support of this bill. I feel that the State Department should and does furnish information on the United States in every part of the world. I am confident that our ambassadors and ministers and everyone connected with our foreign offices are doing all that they can in their official capacities to see that essential information on our country is being supplied to all who make inquiry. I make a distinction between information and propaganda. We have always furnished information through the proper officers in the foreign service, but we are now considering the proposal to supplement information with propaganda. I believe they should be kept separate.

I wish to give you the observations of Dr. Ben M. Cherrington, of Denver, on this situation. I might state that Dr. Cherrington established the first Division of Cultural Relations in the State Department in 1939. He is now director of the Social Science Foundation of the University of Denver. He says:

> As one who has been fairly close to the Department of State's activities in this field, may I say that I believe it important that the Department be authorized to conduct information services throughout the world, as well as to participate in international cultural activities.
> However, I am strongly convinced that it will be a grave error to combine these two functions. They are essentially different. Information is an instrument of the Department of State whereby our policy and program are disseminated abroad. Cultural cooperation, on the other hand, should be characterized by reciprocity and mutuality of interest. There should be no imposition by one nation of its culture on another people. Furthermore, a program of cultural cooperation should arise in the educational, scientific, and cultural institutions of the country. It has been our American tradition to divorce these activities from the Federal Government, in favor of their development under the auspices of State and local governments and private enterprise. A cultural-relations program appropriate to our American tradition, therefore, should stem from the educational, scientific, and cultural agencies of the country, the chief function of the Department of State being to stimulate, facilitate, and coordinate it.

I submit that Dr. Cherrington advances a most logical argument why information and propaganda should not be confused. Personally, I think it is beneath the dignity of our great State Department to engage in propaganda. They should confine their activities to handing out information. If it is wise and necessary for the United States to enter the propaganda field then that agency should be established in some other department of our Government. These two functions should not be combined under the direction of one man in the State Department, as proposed in this measure.

Mr. Speaker, the bill in its present form should not pass.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CHENOWETH] has expired.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GILLIE].

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

CHARLES HALLECK: A GREAT LEADER

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, Republicans of Indiana are understandably proud of the outstanding record which is being made by a distinguished Hoosier son, CHARLES A. HALLECK, as majority leader of the House of Representatives. They are pleased and gratified—but not at all surprised—at the vision and ability he has demonstrated in his new position of national leadership, and of his unfaltering devotion to the objectives and ideals of the Republican Party.

This feeling of pride in the accomplishments of a noted Indiana son is doubly felt by those of us who have had the privilege of working in Congress side by side with the majority leaders for many years.

When CHARLES A. HALLECK first came to Congress in 1935 from the Second Indiana District he served as the lone Republican Member of the Hoosier delegation. The Halleck record in Congress helped to turn the tide in Indiana in 1938 and the Republican delegation from Indiana has since grown to nine House and two Senate Members.

Last Wednesday night at the Hotel Statler in Washington our delegation held another of its regular meetings with H. C. Springer, chairman, and other officials of the Indiana Republican State Committee. Also in attendance was our national chairman and former House colleague, B. Carroll Reece.

During the meeting a statement was unanimously adopted, praising the national leadership of Mr. HALLECK and the splendid record of Gov. Ralph F. Gates and the Republican administration in Indiana.

Under leave granted to extend my remarks, I include this statement in the RECORD:

We, the Indiana Republican Representatives in the United States Congress, are here in another friendly gathering at Washington in recognition of the services extended to us by an able State organization and a capable government at home, marked by competence of officials and sincerity of legislation.

Meantime we in Washington have had before us the national problem. We know that it has been well administered for the majority of the people of America.

The Congress of the United States has entrusted the majority leadership of the House of Representatives to our colleague and fellow Indianian, CHARLES A. HALLECK, Congressman of the Second Indiana District. His leadership has been second in its success to none in the history of our party or of our Nation. It has contributed to the passage by the Congress of a party program broad in scope, liberal in concept and effect, sound in economics, and beneficial to all the people of the Nation.

The leadership of our party in both House and Senate, where we are ably represented by Senators HOMER E. CAPEHART and WILLIAM E. JENNER, has demonstrated for all Americans the capacity of the Republican Party to govern wisely and well, through the untrammeled voice of the people expressed by their servants.

This leadership has strengthened our hands in republicanism not only in the Congress and in the State of Indiana but throughout the great Republic we love and serve.

We are deeply grateful to the events which gave us this leadership. We are proud of the performance of our party in the Congress under this patriotic and statesmanlike guidance. We welcome this opportunity presented today to congratulate the people of this great representative Republic, the adherents of the political faith of Lincoln, and the true lovers of freedom for men throughout this land, and upon the service performed in their behalf by those who are our leaders.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to speak about H. R. 3342, referred to as the Voice of America, but I am going to speak for 5 minutes and bring to you the voice of 10,000,000 veterans who are interested in some legislation which I have had before this Congress since January 3.

On January 3, I introduced a bill to make the terminal-leave bonds redeemable in cash. I could not get any action out of the committee on said bill; and on March 4 I filed a petition on the Speaker's desk to bring the bill before the House for consideration, but, unfortunately, for some reason, that petition has only about 101 names attached to it. I wonder what is causing the delay in getting action on this legislation?

I want to quote to you from the speech made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] when he was just a mere minority leader. Look at the fine language he used when we adopted the conference report on July 31, 1946, as shown on page 10588 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date:

I want to serve notice that nothing is ever settled until it is settled right. If the officers could have cash, then there is no reason on earth why the private soldiers should not be treated the same. After all, it is the good old private and noncom who carried the greater burdens of war. I believe, whatever we do today, this fight will continue. If we do not give fair, equal treatment today, why, then, the next Congress will see the injustice corrected. Eventually, the American people will see that fair play prevails.

During the Seventy-ninth Congress, the then minority leader said "the next Congress will see the injustice corrected"; and now that he is not a mere minority leader, but the powerful Speaker of the House of Representatives, as such Speaker, I appeal to him to demonstrate to the Congress that he meant what he said when he had little power, and that he urge the majority to pass legislation whereby terminal-leave bonds shall be redeemable in cash, or legislation providing that the bonds shall be negotiable.

Is there anything unfair or unjust in H. R. 3, which I introduced on January 3, 1947? However, there appears to have developed some objection to H. R. 3 on groundless fears that it might disturb the cash position of the Treasury or interfere with the balancing of the budget. Whereupon, on May 19, in order to do away with the above groundless fears and objections, I introduced a very simple bill, known as H. R. 3521, providing that the terminal-leave bonds shall be negotiable in the same manner and to the same extent as negotiable instruments payable to bearer, but no person in possession of such a bond shall be considered to be a holder for valuable consideration unless he took it in consideration of the payment of an amount not less than the sum of the principal of such bond plus the interest accrued on such bond to the last day of the month in which the bond was delivered to him.

I believe that I have talked to a majority of the membership of this Congress and I have yet to find one who has any objection to this bill, H. R. 3521, but I am unable to get the bill out for consideration by the House. But where is it lodged? It is still lodged in the committee without any affirmative action being taken thereon, and no report either favorable or unfavorable has been made to the House.

Let me say to this fine man in the chair—and I respect him—he is a fine leader and is a fine organizer and he together with the majority leader the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK], for whom I have the greatest respect and admiration and who has shown his fairness in leadership, together with the majority whip the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. AHRENDS], who also is a constructive leader, if they would just give a whisper in favor of consideration of this legislation, I am sure that the veteran holding terminal-leave bonds would soon be able to get some cash instead of waiting for a period of 5 years.

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. I yield.

Mr. BREHM. I remind the gentleman from Florida that our distinguished Speaker used the word "eventually." I hope that eventually it may be done.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Yes; eventually, but he said "this Congress" as I have read, and I call upon him now, because here is a bill that nobody can object to. It is a bill simply to make these bonds negotiable, and nothing else. It will call for no appropriation out of the Treasury, it will not affect your efforts to reach a balanced budget. It does nothing under God's sun except to give these boys the right to use these bonds. There is not another bondholder of the Government who cannot use his bonds today to get cash. You can get cash on the Treasury bonds; you can get cash on the E bonds; you can get cash on the F bonds; you can get cash on the G bonds; and such bond holders have cashed more than $15,000,000,000 worth of them since their issuance, yet the veteran who needs his money cannot use his bonds to get cash. And Congress is still sitting here doing nothing.

No appropriation is necessary. The only thing that is necessary is to make them negotiable, and nothing else.

Can you find one man who is against it? I have not found a man who has said he is against it, yet I cannot get any action on this legislation.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. I yield.

Mr. COX. I should like to say to the gentleman that while I have not signed his petition to discharge my committee that is in line and consistent with my record in such matters. I, of course, could not be expected to move to discharge my committee, which has never seen the bill.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. There is a rule of the House that says that when a bill has been before a committee for 30 days it shall be in order to file a petition to discharge the committee from further consideration in order that the House might consider the legislation, and I filed the petition so that each Member of the House might have an opportunity to sign same so that the House could pass on the merits of the measure, and it is up to each Member as to whether or not he signs the petition.

Mr. COX. I may say to the gentleman that I see no objection to his bill, and I will vote for it if I have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. I certainly hope the gentleman will help me to give him an opportunity to vote for one of these bills, as I believe he will take pride in so doing.

During the war we all wanted quick action from our soldiers—to get the job done—and it would have been sheer folly to have handed a soldier a bomb that would not explode for 5 years. Now that they have done this job 10,000,000 veterans want quick action from us; they don't want a bond that cannot be cashed for 5 years. I appeal to you to help pass this legislation so that the boys can get their cash. They got action with bombs; now let us give them action on the bonds.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I have been opposed to the State Department's broadcasting program or propaganda program ever since it was started, because I have felt very conscientiously that it was doing more harm than good. I still feel that the broadcasting program is in the same hands that it has been for some time and that it will continue to be. I was delighted when the appropriation covering it was thrown out of the appropriation bill on a point of order.

The program we have before us now would make that expenditure in order.

In an argument we listened to today we were told that America had only one thing to sell to the world. That one thing was the American way of life. Well, personally, I do not want to sell the American way of life to the world, because always when I have sold something I lost possession of it. That is exactly what we are going to do in our program in this instance. We are going to lose possession of our American way of life in trying to foster it all over the world. That is my attitude; therefore, I am opposed to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

SHOULD BE NO OPPOSITION TO FOREIGN INFORMATION PROGRAM

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of the time on this side.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that if the membership of the House were aware of all the distinguished leaders of science and letters, of business and the professions, and of public service who have endorsed and urged the passage of this bill to authorize by law a foreign information program in the State Department, and if they fully realized at what disadvantage our own businessmen are placed for lack of an effective program of this kind, there would be no effective opposition.

Certainly there is no one here who would have the audacity to insinuate that either Gen. George C. Marshall, the Secretary of State, or the Honorable James Byrnes, or the Honorable Cordell Hull, or the Honorable Sumner Welles is lacking in patriotism or devotion to our country, or has the slightest tinge of pink in his outlook; yet these outstanding Americans are in the very forefront of the advocates of this bill.

The heads of the principal radio broadcasting and manufacturing companies joined in a single statement in its support.

Professional radio leaders, writers, editors, executives, businessmen, industrialists, labor leaders, religious leaders, women's clubs, educators, publicists, high naval and military officers—in short, responsible citizens from every walk of life—have raised their voices severally and jointly in behalf of the program and of this legislation.

GALAXY OF BIG NAMES

Space does permit me to present even a representative roster of the galaxy of big names who have advocated such a program. I select these few names at random merely to suggest the wide range of enthusiasm the project has evoked: Philip Reed, chairman of General Electric; George Schuster, president, Barnard College; George Zook, president, American Council on Education; William Paley, chairman, Columbia Broadcasting Co.; B. M. McKelway, editor, Washington Star; Gardner Cowles, Jr., publisher and radio owner; William Batt, president of SKF Industries; Albert Warner, commentator and news editor for MBS; John Collyer, president, Goodrich Rubber Co.; Paul G. Hoffman, president, Studebaker Corp.; Palmer Hoyt, publisher, Denver Post; Ben Moreel, president, Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp.; Fleet Adm. C. W. Nimitz; Gen. Omar N. Bradley; Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower; Secretary of Commerce Averell Harriman.

Newspapers and magazines are almost unanimous in their editorial endorsement of the program; and the exceptions are in themselves endorsements.

ALL ARE PATRIOTIC

Surely there is not one of these hundreds of individuals and organizations and publications not as devoted to our country and its ideals as the few gentlemen here on this floor who, blinded with prejudice and with minds closed to every new idea, have misrepresented all that has been said here, and who in season and out seek to prejudice the minds of the people against all progress.

Unfortunately, it is always easy for a few able men with strong voices to create antagonism against deserving legislation if the proposals represent any departure from tradition.

NOTHING TO FEAR FROM ADVERTISING OUR WAY OF LIFE

Mr. Speaker, we have nothing to fear from making known to the whole world our way of life. We have nothing to lose by familiarizing all the people, everywhere, with our institutions, our wonderful country, our cities, and our farms and our factories. We can gain much.

We should make known the superiority of those things we produce or manufacture, which we must continue to produce and manufacture and sell abroad if we are to remain prosperous and dispose of our surpluses. We now possess the facilities for production of vastly more than we can consume; and the whole world is hungry for a portion of our production. I believe this legislation is a major step in the right direction.

WHAT IS FOREIGN?

Mr. Speaker, I regret profoundly that some mention has been made on this floor, in the House of Representatives of the United States of America, or "foreign-sounding names," with some insinuations against the loyalty of people with such names.

Mr. Speaker, what is "foreign"?

I would remind the gentleman that in the Continental armies which fought that this country, with its blessings of liberty, freedom, and rich natural resources might be born, there were Poles, Germans, Dutch, English, French, Scotch, Irish, Welsh, Danes, Swiss, Italians, Catholic, Protestant, infidel, Jew, Negro, Indian; why even the Friends of William Penn's colony upheld the torch of freedom!

In every war in which this country has been engaged people with "foreign" names have distinguished themselves with valor and glory.

There has just been delivered to us the two volumes of combat-connected casualties in the Navy in World War II.

I beg of the gentlemen study the names listed there—the names of Americans who died gloriously that this country, that this democracy, might live.

Here is our own State of Illinois. Let me read from the "A's" on the very first page: Abbott, Abel, Abrahamson, Abt, Abts, Acock, Adami, Adams, Adamson, Aden, Agrimonti, Ahlstrom, Albietz, Aldrich, Alexander, Allabaugh, Allan, Allison, Allsop, Almanza, Althamar, Altmann, Amato.

What is foreign, Mr. Speaker?

Let me go on, not taking the names in order, but at random from succeeding pages: Bacha, Beaudry, Cadwallader, Christopoulos, Dworniczek, Erickson, Farni, Ghent, Gluba, Haas, Jones, Laszewski, Makucas, MacDougall, McGonigal, Mytys, Nalazek, Palouyan, Pappas, Riordan, Rios, Quan, Radke, Schmitt, Smith, Sajtar, Stein, Steinberg, St. Germain, Straus, Swanson, Torres, Van Buren, Weber, Zabinski.

THEY DIED FOR THIS COUNTRY

Mr. Speaker, what is foreign?

Those boys died for us, for our country, and our free institutions.

Whether their grandfathers came from Maine or the Ukraine; from Oregon or County Cork; from Georgia, U. S. A.; or Georgia, U. S. S. R., life was equally sweet to all of them.

Loyalty to this country is not measured in terms of surnames, or of religious affiliation, or national derivation.

And in war and in peace, the immigrant has built this country, made this country, won this country, preserved this country, whether he came on the Mayflower or the Queen Mary; whether he spoke English or Chinese, Gaelic or Slavic, German or Arabian.

THEY CREATED WEALTH

Anyone who has studied the glorious history of this, the greatest country in the world, knows that the immigrants have created wealth out of nature's bounty, and that they have served their country well.

Here are some more names, the names of immigrants who have made vast contributions to American science, industry, arts: Andrew Carnegie, Samuel Slater, John Jacob Astor, Michael Cudahy, Frank Assman, Joseph Bulova, David Sarnoff, William S. Knudsen, Ole Evinrude, Lucas Petrou Kyrides, John Garand, John A. Roebling, Simon Baruch, Joseph Pulitzer—you know their names, and a thousand more.

Other anonymous millions built the railroads, rolled the steel, dug the ore, broke the plains, felled the timber, tilled the fields of cotton, wheat, tobacco, and corn.

What is "foreign"?

LET US HAVE FAITH IN AMERICA

Let us have faith in our country, in the unending solidity of this splendid structure of popular representative government so nobly fashioned by the founding fathers.

Are we ashamed now that this country was born in revolution?

George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Ben Franklin, James Madison, Gouverneur Morris—they had faith in the people. They built so well that this Government has endured without change from its inception 170 years ago, longer than that of any other great power.

Shall we then falter in our faith?

No, Mr. Speaker, we have nothing to fear from a few misguided men if we continue to maintain our democratic system.

If valid criticisms are made, then they serve us well, for we can correct the faults; and if they criticize and ridicule what we know is right, then their words fall on barren soil. There is no other system of free government that can compete or compare with the American system. The few students who come over here under authority of this legislation will return to their homelands missionaries for our way of life; and our students abroad will find that no other people have achieved what Americans have achieved in comfort, in freedom, and in equality.

UNFOUNDED ACCUSATIONS UN-AMERICAN

We are not experts at everything. We cannot produce everything.

We have received from across the seas many capable, patriotic men and women who have contributed greatly to America, and who have served her well. It is due to them as much, if not more, as to the descendants of the earliest settlers that this has become the greatest country in the world. The dream of freedom is common to all men; and America is the tangible form of that dream everywhere.

Let us desist from these unworthy insinuations against the loyalty of other Americans just because of the spelling of a name.

Such unfounded accusations are unfair, undemocratic, and un-American. Certainly I disagree here most strongly with many of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, but shall I question their loyalty to this country we both serve to the best of our ability and according to our lights?

BUT SOME LEAN TO FOREIGN IDEAS

But, Mr. Speaker, I cannot extend that tolerance to a few who constantly criticize and assail every progressive proposal, and who seem to feel that the Nazi system, or the government of the Russian czars, is a better way of life than the American way. Theirs too often are the voices which shout "un-American" when they should be shouting "Hurrah!"

There are those who seem deeply sympathetic to our defeated enemies who forced upon us, to defend our way of life, a ghastly war which cost us 300,000 dead, almost a million casualties, and created a staggering public debt of $270,000,000,000 which cannot be paid off for generations yet to come.

They seem to feel that the czarist regime in Russia, or the corrupt Hapsburg empire of Austro-Hungary, or the imperial Fasicst Italy of Mussolini, or the oriental despotism of the Christian-killing Turks, or the infamous horrors of Hitler's nazism, or the bloody rule of Franco in Spain, are preferable to the free American way.

Perhaps they think only of the moment, when they see in Europe that the Bulgars, the Poles, the Czechs, the Slavs, the Rumanians, and other small nationalities are about to attain the freedom and independence for which they have dreamed and schemed for centuries; and, because these men have lost or never had that dream of freedom, they see only the violence, the temporary orientation of Russia which seems to promise them protection of their freedom.

SHOULD STUDY AMERICANISM

These discordant souls should study the history of America. They should read the inspired words of Thomas Jefferson. They should realize that the liberal and humanitarian principles of our constitutional democracy made possible the sharing of our freedom with all.

For my part, I am opposed to all isms.

I believe sincerely that fascism is a greater threat to America than communism, but I oppose both with equal vigor.

Since the sixteenth century, people have come to this country to escape not only want and misery and physical degradation, but religious persecution and political and intellectual repression. Here the horizons are wider. Let us, Mr. Speaker, keep them that way.

There is no room for nazi-fascism; there is no room for communism.

Let democracy continue as it has, always growing, always becoming better, and we need not fear the future.

COMPLIMENTS COMMITTEE

I desire to offer to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which unanimously reported this bill favorably to the House, my sincere personal congratulations and compliments on the way they have discharged their duties and their obligations to our great country.

I am sure that the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], who presented the report, and other distinguished members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs will have ample opportunity to explain the bill in full detail, and satisfy the membership that there is nothing to be feared, for every practicable safeguard has been set up to prevent deterioration of the program.

I know, too, that gentlemen of the House and the Nation at large have full confidence in the Secretary of State, General Marshall, who will have ultimate responsibility for the conduct of the program; in Mr. William Benton, who rose from midwestern farm boy to head an advertising agency so successful that he could retire from business and devote himself to public service at an age when most Americans have yet to make their first million, and who, God knows, does not bear any fearsome foreign-sounding name; and in Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, the head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, who will be responsible for screening out from the personnel any individuals who might have a thought not approved by some of the ultrapatriotic gentlemen who have spoken here today in opposition to the bill.

In these hands, and in the language of the act, we can all feel secure, and know that in every way the rights and interests of our country have been fully protected.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT].

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, yesterday by virtually unanimous vote the House appropriated $5,280,000,000 for the War Department. Along with the rest of you I supported that measure, because along with the rest of you I believe we have got to have a strong defense system; that we have got to be prepared for the contingency of war; that it is essential we remain strong and secure as a nation. I call attention to the fact, however, that with no opposition $5,280,000,000 was appropriated because of the chaotic, and uncertain, and disturbing conditions prevailing in the world today.

We come before you this afternoon asking you to authorize an appropriation which, if the State Department got every dime it asked, would be $31,000,000. It is not going to get every dime of that. We know that the Committee on Appropriations is going to reduce the request considerably. They may give $20,000,000, they may give $10,000,000 or $12,000,000, but I call attention to the contrast in figures. We are asking for this comparatively paltry sum and this authorization so that the Congress at long last can do something constructive to win the peace, to prepare for peace, to give the peace department of this Government a little money and a little authority and a little equipment for once as we so rightfully give it to the War Department.

I am appalled at some of the arguments I have heard today, because I cannot reconcile them with the attitudes I know prevail in the hearts of men who made them and who want peace and who want the American concept to spread. I call attention to the fact that the Secretary of State, Mr. Marshall, has said that if this battle for peace is going to have a chance to win, he needs this kind of legislation. And, every Assistant Secretary of State in the Department has said the same. General Eisenhower, Chief of Staff, has said that if his preparedness to maintain the security of America is to work effectively, he wants this type of program enacted into law. General Bedell Smith, our Ambassador in the most troublesome spot in the world today, our Ambassador to Moscow, came back from Moscow to plead for this kind of legislation, and the Committee on Foreign Affairs reports it to you unanimously. Every responsible authority this country has that is charged with the heavy duties of protecting America and of promoting and preserving the peace is a strong support of H. R. 3342 and the program it would set in motion.

The costs of this program are, at the outside, $30,000,000. Compare that, if you please, with the $12,000,000,000 we have already authorized since the war to be spent overseas to achieve the objectives that all the advisers this Government has in the field of security and peace tell us they cannot well achieve without this legislation and without this program.

Now let us get the picture clear. I join the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] in saying I think the Committee on Appropriations rendered a service to Congress by refusing to appropriate the money in bulk fund and by knocking out the present so-called cultural program on a point of order, because now we have before you comprehensive, clear-cut legislation, with at least 20 congressional controls over this program which have never existed before. In the course of the general debate and in the course of the consideration of the bill under the 5-minute rule we are going to explain those controls and safeguards to you one by one.

We are not asking you to continue as it is the program now functioning. We are asking you to establish a new office and a new program with new guide lines and new safeguards and new controls, with authority completely in the hands of Congress, and we ask you to appropriate for it what you think is wise after the authorization is made.

At this time I ask you only to be good enough to hear the arguments, to grant the rule, to give us a chance to tell you why all of the men of the Government at the top levels charged with defending us in times of war and protecting the peace have joined the unanimous vote of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs in urging you to enact this new program for winning the peace.

THE DOCTRINE OF RECIPROCITY

Let me point out just one or two of the safeguards. We are going to discuss them in detail when we get into general debate. This legislation does something which I know most of the Members of this House want to have achieved. On page 3, if you will look at the bill, the so-called Mundt bill writes into the legislative language of Congress for the first time in American history the doctrine of reciprocity insofar as our interchange and contact with foreign nations is concerned. It provides that this program will operate only with those countries engaging in reciprocal arrangements with us. Let me say to those who fear that a Russian or two is going to come to America that we now have in this country 3,669 Russians inspecting America, looking at our plants, and going to school. None of them came in because the OIC is in operation. None of them came in under the Voice of America program. They came in despite the program. They will continue to come in unless H. R. 3342 becomes a law. They came in because the law of the land today has nothing against their coming in with visitors' visas. They came in under visitors' visas, as citizens of one country have a right to visit another under existing international arrangements of comity. But this legislation will make a change in that, because the Russians have permitted us to send only 250 Americans over there, and this writes into law the principle of reciprocity. Those that want to do something about getting our arrangements with Russia on a realistic, reciprocal basis vote against their own convictions and their creed if they vote against this legislation, because it writes into law the doctrine of reciprocity for the first time in American history.

Let me say a word about the professors who might come over to this country from Russia or some other Communist country. This legislation provides that if any visitor from any country under this program is over here engaging in activities not consistent with the security of the United States or of a political nature, the machinery of deportation shall be brought against him promptly and completely—an additional safeguard, completely new, and novel, in American history. It is a new safeguard in the interest of security, in the interest of peace, and in the interest of reciprocity, the only firm foundation upon which nations can live as friends and endure under peaceful conditions.

To those who say that in the employment of this particular agency there are some who are unfit for the job, and I presume that is true, let me say that we have set down an arrangement for screening everyone of them by the FBI. Everyone now employed and everyone who might be employed is to be screened by the FBI, and the check is complete. It is in fact as comprehensive and as detailed as the check we made against the men working on the Manhattan project developing the atom bomb during the war. There is not a Chinaman's chance that a Communist or a Fascist or any un-American can work his way into the employment of this division of the Government under the restrictive legislation written into this act. This legislation makes certain that the Voice of America will at all times be a truly sturdy American voice.

I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JACKSON of California. Is it not true that a great many other countries under this plan besides Russia are involved in this interchange of information?

Mr. MUNDT. Russia is going to be considered as being directly reached by but a very small portion of the program. The magazine America, of which we are going to tell you later, deals with Russia. This program deals largely with those areas of the earth where it is so important for us to maintain friendly contacts if America is going to have the friends it needs in these disturbing times. I hope you will now vote for this rule so that Congress can have the opportunity to consider this important peace program on its true merits.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3342) to enable the Government of the United States more effectively to carry on its foreign relations by means of promotion of the interchange of persons, knowledge, and skills between the people of the United States and other countries, and by means of public dissemination abroad of information about the United States, its people, and its policies.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3342, with Mr. JENKINS of Ohio in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, let me make it clear in the first place, continuing about where I left off while talking on the rule, that in asking you to support H. R. 3342 we are not asking you to perpetuate a program nor are we asking you to experiment on uncharted seas on which we have had no experience. Regardless of what happens on this question today, the OIC expires on July 1. If you do nothing at all, the only thing that takes the place of the experimental program which has been carried on in sending information from America throughout the world will be some locked desks, some empty offices, and dust accumulating on some old files.

We are asking you to enact this legislation establishing a new office—the Office of Information and Educational Exchange—to engage in a new program to be financed by new appropriations specifically named and which activity will be staffed in large part by new personnel because every present employee in the OIC on the 1st day of June received his termination notice because that office expires on July 1 and everybody will have to be reappointed or find employment in a new position.

In my opinion, it would be tragic to muffle the Voice of America either by slashing its jugular vein through denying the appropriations required to conduct a United States information service abroad or by darkening the beacon light of American freedom which now shines brightly in some areas and just manages to filter through into others but which all the world today recognizes as the last and best great hope of all mankind to perpetuate the peace and promote sound justice and good will. H. R. 3342 provides the machinery and the methods for projecting the voice and spirit of America not only by short-wave radio but by the printed word, the use of information centers abroad, the friendly visit of invited technicians and by other methods. It also sets up procedures whereby students, scholars, and serious observers from abroad can visit America and learn about our formula of freedom here in the greatest successful laboratory of freedom, tolerance, and self-government the world has ever known. Mr. Speaker, all of us talk about peace but H. R. 3342 sets in motion the minds and actions of men to do something about creating the only sort of environment in which peace can flourish and endure.

This is not a question to be decided by differences between so-called isolationists and internationalists. It is a choice between adopting a policy for America which embraces either incapacitation or initiative as the device by which we hope to exert our leadership in this postwar world and by which we expect to get across to questioning people in every foreign land the real truth about American concepts, American ideals, and American objectives.

Certainly if we gag our own voice, strait-jacket our own hands and feet, and place blinders on our own eyes, our hope of leading the world to peace and away from atomic annihilation is indeed both dim and dreary. It is because I am convinced the vast majority of the Members of Congress of every party, from every section of the country, and of every variety of thinking from the standpoint of what they consider proper and appropriate American foreign policy believe and must agree that whatever our policy and wherever and however we build for a secure tomorrow we must in this supersonic age of travel and communication keep the rest of the world advised of our purposes and our program that I have labored so long and so hard to bring H. R. 3342 before you in a form and language which I dare to hope will win your overwhelming support.

By the most conservative estimates we are already committed to spend or have spent nearly 12 billions of American dollars abroad since the end of the war. What is the purpose of these vast expenditures? We all know the answer—it was spent, whether wisely or wrongly and whether poorly or well, because all Americans desire this hard-won peace to endure. What a commentary it would be on the judgment and prudence of this Congress were we to refuse to dedicate, let us say, one-fourth of 1 percent of what we are already pledged to send overseas for the just and noble purpose of making positive that the people and the places which receive this American aid know that it comes from a friendly America, that they know why it comes, and that they know something about the peace-loving, unselfish, nonaggressive, good Samaritans who comprise America and who ask in return for their billions only that world order be restored and world peace sustained. Unless there is no merit at all in the economic axiom that "it pays to advertise," this program is one which we cannot afford to avoid.

Mr. Chairman, the Office of Information and Educational Exchange will operate to win friends and influence people abroad. Its objective is to make friends for Uncle Sam and to win converts away from the war-god Mars. It is an adventure in good will. For less than one-fourth the cost of a single modern battleship we propose through this program to try just once in the long, bloody history of war-torn relations between countries to give truth and understanding, and friendly feelings an opportunity to help put an end to the continuing wars which have brought civilization to the abyss of an atom-bomb-accumulating armistice. Suppose we fail—the most we can lose by trying is less than the cost of 30 seconds of the type of war we are trying to avert and which up to now has never been averted by any of the traditional, customary, and proverbial methods men have tried.

Mr. Chairman, against a mobilized world public opinion that knows what it wants and has plans how to get it, there is no power or purpose which can be arrayed successfully. The great objective and the end goal of the program I am today proposing is to do its full part in helping to plant and to nourish the thoughts and ideals in the hearts and minds of common people everywhere which will marshal such informed opinion into effective channels for preserving the peace.

Over the long pull, sir, if peace is to prevail it is essential that the hatreds, the greeds, the selfishness, the avarice, the distrust, the misunderstandings, the suspicions, and the false concepts of all humanity must be toned down and controlled by self-restraints and general enlightenment. Men and women everywhere must come to know for themselves those things which are basically sound and fundamentally true if right is to conquer might and if war is not to recur.

Let us remember that the coin of peace has two sides. It has its material as well as its spiritual side. When battalions of men meet across boundary lines, war is the result. H. R. 3342 sets up a procedure for bringing about the meeting of minds across boundary lines in the pursuit of peace and the mutual understandings upon which peace can be built enduringly. We plan to utilize the free flow of ideas and culture across boundary lines which will enrich the life of everyone. We plan to exchange scholars and students, textbooks and techniques, periodicals and programs, to the end that children throughout the world may come to be taught the virtues of showing consideration for others and the vices of bigoted and bludgeoning types of state worship.

This program has no special creed to espouse save peace, justice, and tolerance. It is an American program to induce others through reciprocal means to cooperate in promoting good order and good will. It recognizes no monarch greater than the Prince of Peace. It gives the common people who fight all of the wars an opportunity to learn the truths and practice the concepts which will avoid future wars. It provides a people's foyer leading to the temple of permanent peace.

We ask you to appropriate about one-fourth as much as it costs to build a single battleship, to try something new in the field of international relations; to try something different in what up to now has been an ineffectual record in trying to perpetuate world peace. We ask you to join us in an effort to marshal public opinion around the world for peace, and to eliminate misunderstandings, suspicions, doubts, and skepticisms which have held men apart. We ask you to do that by joining us in the passage of this legislation.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. SHAFER. Is this legislation to make possible berths for those who have already been in this type of work?

Mr. MUNDT. No. Very definitely it is not.

Mr. SHAFER. As I understand it, others who come in now under your bill must all be screened.

Mr. MUNDT. Precisely. In fact, those presently employed who may be reappointed must also be screened by the FBI.

As I have said, this is not a program to be abhored by isolationists and to be acclaimed by internationalists, whatever those outworn terms may mean or imply. The rapid march of world events during and since the war have outmoded such distinctions and have invalidated most of the arguments used by either group to substantiate its reasoning. The question we face today is not whether we should attempt to isolate ourselves in an atomic era of supersonic planes and jet-propelled weapons in which vast oceans and whole continents have become of less consequence in self-defense than was formerly true of a single river or a mountain chain. The question we must face up to now is whether the great United States should incapacitate itself by denying to ourselves weapons of information and communication which all other important nations are now utilizing with accelerating speed and significance.

Surely he who today preaches a doctrine of incapacitation for America goes far beyond those who in the era of the twenties and thirties, and up to Pearl Harbor, were classified as isolationists. At least those who would have isolated America from the wars abroad wanted to keep America strong at home and were generally found in support of great defensive military establishments. However the super-duper stay-at-homes of today who embrace the doctrine of incapacitation for America through opposing a program of informational and educational exchange make pikers out of yesteryear's so-called isolationists by comparison. These incapacitators would disarm America of its weapons for defense and offense in the significant era of world opinion at the very juncture of history when the fate of all humanity rests upon the development of sound world opinion and the recognition of sane concepts and peaceful purposes by the Nations and the peoples of the earth. Isolationists had the merit of wanting to keep America out of war. Incapacitationists surely can claim slight merit for desiring to keep America out of the peace.

If we incapacitate ourselves by disqualifying ourselves as effective leaders in the world by eliminating our contacts abroad, how are we going to maintain peace? How are we going to resist and offset the propaganda coming out of poisonous mouths in many parts of the world, maligning and slandering America and misrepresenting us? If we deny curselves the right of rebuttal; if we deny ourselves access, through equipment and means, to the hearts and minds and eyes and ears of the world, how are other countries to learn the truth about America? If we refuse to tell the American story ourselves, who will replace us on the air waves and on the printed pages of the world?

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Will not this service arm and sustain the people in those foreign countries who are making the fight for recovery and the great fight for democracy?

Mr. MUNDT. Absolutely. There is no one so completely under the heel of a dictatorship but what there still burns a little flame of freedom somewhere in his country. Back in the hills and in the little huts there are people in every land dreaming of the day when they can be free. This gives them something to hope for. It gives them some idea of what they dream about in the darkness of their dictatorial oppression. It provides a sense of reality that what they hope and pray for may some day come to pass in their own areas of the world.

No man ever gets so rich that he can afford to lose a friend. No nation ever becomes so powerful that it can afford to ignore what other countries think about it, whether they be big or small, civilized or uncivilized. Good will means something to a country in time of peace; and sometimes, as was demonstrated in the north Africa campaign, it may mean the difference between defeat and victory in time of war. So I think that over the long pull, if we are going to have peace, it is essential that we provide the mechanism and machinery whereby we can promote those points of view and points of contact which are favorable to us.

We have provided over 20 safeguards in the Mundt bill, not only against infiltration of un-American individuals into the organization which is to be created, but safeguards protecting the economy of America; safeguards providing that Congress be kept informed of what is going on; safeguards providing for guidance and counsel and advice from the private professions and industry to help the State Department develop the best possible type of program; safeguards precluding the employment of aliens except in those areas where Americans are unable to speak the dialect being broadcast; safeguards so that the Voice of America will be spoken by Americans and the spirit of America will be interpreted by loyal American citizens who are enthusiastic, sincere, and able exponents and disciples of our cherished ways of life.

We have included safeguards providing that wherever possible the State Department must use private agencies in order to carry out the program; safeguards so that Congress by concurrent resolution can stop the program or any portion of it any time it chooses without a Presidential signature, because we want the Congress and the country to feel secure and convinced that this is a program of Americans broadcasting the voice of America in a manner in which all Americans can be proud.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. I know the gentleman has given a great deal of time to the preparation of the bill but there is one thing I think ought to be explained to the committee and that is the present channels that we have in the air. If we should not pass this legislation or do something so as to retain those channels we lose them. I wish the gentleman would explain to the committee that if those channels are once given up through lack of use at the end of this month we have lost them never to get them back; they are gone forever and we could not do the thing we are trying to do here. We must retain those channels.

Mr. MUNDT. The gentleman is precisely correct. Under the international allocations of short wave channels, when you cease to use your channel your rights are lost. It is very similar to the land situation in my State in the old days when people established squatters' rights. Squatters would move in there and as long as they lived on a quarter section and defied the elements, if they lived there long enough the land became theirs. But if they moved off for a while they lost their squatters' rights, somebody else moved in and they never could get their rights restored. So it is with these wave lengths. If we do not use them, if we let them go even for a little while they are lost to us forever and some other country will appropriate them to broadcast their propaganda against us. Unless we adopt this legislation we lose our squatters' rights on the highly valuable wave lengths now assigned to us.

Mr. BLOOM. Some other country will move right in and take those wave lengths over and we have lost them forever.

Mr. MUNDT. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. What has been done in this bill with regard to reciprocity?

Mr. MUNDT. I explained that at the beginning of my remarks. I know the gentleman was called from the Chamber by a telephone call and might not have been here when I touched on it, and I did so rather hurriedly.

In this bill for the first time in legislative history, let me say to the gentleman from Illinois, there is a formula for reciprocity. Briefly, if concessions are not granted us we do not grant them to such countries over here. It is in the bill and it seems to me it is a tremendously significant safeguard, it is a great step forward, it is an affirmative declaration. It is not a policy which antagonizes anybody but it is a fundamental policy which would be made clear by my bill and which would work with equity for all concerned.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I am delighted to yield to the ranking minority member of my subcommittee who has given invaluable help in the perfecting of this legislation.

Mr. RICHARDS. Is it not a fact that another good safeguard is contained in the bill to the effect that the policy may be terminated by Congress itself at any time? I do not know whether the gentleman mentioned that or not.

Mr. MUNDT. I mentioned it but I may have skipped over it rather hastily. In order, however, to make this remain a congressional activity under complete congressional control at all times, we put in a specific proviso that the whole program or any portion of it can be repealed by concurrent resolution of Congress. We retain the right to exercise our own judgment in maintaining control of the legislation and in evaluating its effectiveness.

NEW CONGRESSIONAL CONTROLS OVER NEW PROGRAM

Mr. Chairman, before concluding I want to call attention specifically to the 20 definite and complete congressional controls which H. R. 3342 set up to direct and govern the activities of this new office and the new and expanded program which this legislation authorizes it to undertake. Nothing is further from the fact than to make the careless and unsupported statement that H. R. 3342 proposes simply to continue in existence a prevailing program or to project a present policy into permanency. H. R. 3342 does nothing of the kind, Mr. Chairman. H. R. 3342 is new legislation. It is specific, clear-cut, comprehensive, and it establishes controls and safeguards never before found in any American program of information service abroad, whether it be that operated in the Western Hemisphere alone under the office of the Inter-American Coordinator or whether it be that of the OWI during the war, the psychological-warfare program of the War Department, or the OIC which temporarily took over some of the operations of the Office of War Information during the postwar era but which office is being definitely and completely terminated on June 30 this year, regardless of the outcome of this legislation.

Let me give you the facts from the printed record and I hope you will supplement this information by reading the comprehensive volume of hearings which we held on H. R. 3342 and the committee report which accompanies it. Here, however, by specific, definite reference to page, section, and line are the new safeguards by which Congress will direct the activities of this new program and by which Congress will keep it constantly under its control and supervision.

No. 1. On page 3, section 201, line 15, you will find set forth in unmistakably clear language the doctrine of reciprocity governing our international relations and activities. I have discussed this previously in this address so I shall not elaborate upon it further now.

No. 2. On the same page, page 3, starting on line 21, you will observe that we require the Secretary of State to turn over for deportation any foreign visitor who abuses the privileges he enjoys under his visitor's visa by engaging in activities of a political nature or in activities not consistent with the security of the United States. May I add, Mr. Chairman, that since visitors are now in the United States and will always be here whether we enact H. R. 3342 or not, this is a highly significant new safeguard since it gives the Secretary of State authority and instructions which will not only stop any existing un-American activities on the part of foreign visitors but which will make certain under the exchange program we propose to establish there shall be no abuses of this type. This safeguard is specific, stern, and clear.

No. 3. On page 4, section 203, line 19, we provide that no assistance under this act shall be furnished of any character not in keeping with the free democratic principles and the established foreign policy of the United States. Mr. Chairman, here once again we write into law the clear conviction of Congress that this shall be an American program, projecting American concepts, and conforming with American ideals.

No. 4. Page 9, line 4: Here we make clear that nothing in this act shall authorize the extension of services and advice to foreign countries relating to the organization, training, operation, development, or combat equipment of the armed forces of a foreign government. You see, Mr. Chairman, throughout this legislation we retain the fundamental purpose of this program. This is a peace bill, sir, and not in any sense a war measure or a military proposition.

No. 5. On page 8, section 403, line 12, we specify that the Secretary of State shall encourage the performance of the services proposed under this legislation by private American individuals and agencies. Only where private enterprise is unable or unwilling to function is it contemplated the information and educational exchange program established under H. R. 3342 shall be handled by the Government itself.

No. 6. Again on page 8, section 403, line 16, we provide that the services abroad rendered by a Government agency shall be advisory, investigative, or instructional in character for purposes of demonstration and not in competition with private enterprise.

No. 7. Still on page 8, section 403, line 20, we make even clearer that such services abroad shall not include the construction of public works or the supervision of such construction. It is our purpose to aid private engineers and private American enterprises to secure business connections and contracts abroad and not in any way to interfere with private enterprise. That we have been successful in doing this is clearly apparent from the fact that the Committee on International Relations of the Engineers Joint Council has enthusiastically recommended passage of this bill. The testimony of their spokesmen is found on page 178 of the printed hearings available to each of you.

No. 8. Page 9, line 8, we specify that services by our Government to foreign countries shall not be undertaken if such services will impair the fulfillment of domestic responsibilities of any Government agency. In other words, we clearly recognize and stipulate that the primary function of an American Government agency is to handle the needs and requirements of Americans first.

No. 9. Page 9, line 12. Here we stipulate clearly that this is to be no great haven of bureaucracy and no starry-eyed adventure by impractical idealists or theorists. Here it is provided that the Department of State shall invite in outstanding leaders—please note the language is mandatory—in the various fields of activity covered by this act to review and extend advice on the policies in each of the various categories concerned.

No. 10. Page 11, section 502, line 7: We have made it crystal clear in the language of this so-called Mundt bill that this program will not establish competitive Government radio and press agencies to compete with private American enterprise. Note the language of this specific congressional directive:

> The Secretary shall encourage and facilitate by appropriate means the dissemination abroad of information about the United States by private individuals and agencies, shall supplement such private information dissemination where necessary, and shall reduce such Government information activities whenever corresponding private information dissemination is found to be adequate.

Mr. Chairman, the Office of Information and Educational Exchange as proposed by H. R. 3342 will become the only Government agency in the United States operating under a congresesional mandate to work itself out of a job as soon as possible.

No. 11. Page 11, line 15: Here we stipulate directly that this act shall not be construed in any way to give the Government a monopoly in the production or sponsorship on the air of short-wave broadcasting programs or a monopoly in any other medium of information. Mr. Chairman, it is interesting to observe here that all seven of the short-wave liscencees in the United States are in favor of this program and that well over 80 percent of the editorial opinion of this country has also been expressed in support of it.

No. 12. Page 11, line 17: We provide specifically here that the State Department shall—again please note this is a directive not a suggestion—invite in outstanding private leaders in cultural and informational fields to review and extend advice on the Government's international information activities. We have proposed, sir, to mobilize in this great crusade to win and preserve the peace the best brains and capacities of America both in and out of Government in every field of endeavor and pursuit incorporated in this legislation.

No. 13. Page 11, still in section 502, near the bottom of this page, please, on line 21: To make double certain and completely positive that there shall be no competition by the Government against private enterprise we stipulate that all films, broadcasts, and other materials in the fields of mass media shall be identified as to Government source when they are so projected.

No. 14. Page 14, line 4: Again to make positive that this becomes truly the voice of America we stipulate that the employment of aliens shall be sharply limited to services related to the translation or narration of colloquial speech in foreign languages when suitably qualified United States citizens are not available. These will be very few in number but where they are required their services become invaluable.

No. 15. Page 16, section 703, starting on line 21: To prevent this operation from becoming a sprawling bureaucratic office and to safeguard the American taxpayer we specify that the maximum use must be made of existing Government property and facilities where Government property or services are required to be used under this act. Thus where embassy property abroad can be used, it will be; where existing offices can be used at home, that is required. Small as are the outside expenditures to be made by this operation, we have set up safeguards that they all be used economically and efficiently.

No. 16. Page 18, section 901, starting on line 14: This is the now famous loyalty check on all personnel to be used in this program. It requires that all people employed or assigned to duties under this act must first be screened and certified as to loyalty and security by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. I have discussed this earlier in this speech so I shall not amplify upon this safeguard further now. It is the complete answer, however, to those who worry as all of us rightfully should lest un-American influences creep into this or any other division of the State Department. You can be sure before the FBI certifies as to their loyality the people in this division will be completely and adequately investigated and examined.

No. 17. Page 19, section 904, line 20: This safeguard provides that nothing in this act shall authorize the disclosure of any information or knowledge in any case in which such disclosure is prohibited by other law of the United States such as in the case of atomic developments, for example, or where it is inconsistent with the security of the United States. Since the War Department is to be represented on the Interdepartmental Coordinating Committee advising the Secretary of State on the conduct of this program this provides a full and effective safeguard concerning our military secrets as well as upon other developments which might better not be disclosed.

No. 18. Page 20, section 906, line 18: Once again to make definite and clear the mandate of Congress we here provide that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State—need I add, sir, that any Cabinet officer can be impeached for a violation of duty—that insofar as is practicable the services and facilities of private agencies, through contractual arrangements or otherwise, must be utilized in carrying out the provisions of this act. By bringing in here the element of contractual arrangements we specifically provide the avenue and agency for utilizing a wide field of private agencies in implementing the program set up in H. R. 3342.

No. 19. Page 21, section 908, beginning on line 6: To retain the full control of this program in the hands of Congress—and whom, may I ask, are we to trust if we cannot trust ourselves?—we provide that the authority of this act or any provision of it shall terminate whenever such termination is directed by concurrent resolution of the two Houses of Congress. Since such a termination procedure does not require the signature of the President it means that a simple majority of the Congress can terminate this program in whole or in part at any time it so desires or at any time it finds or feels that the program is neither effective nor efficient. Seldom has legislation been written which carries a more direct and decisive safeguard.

No. 20. Page 21, section 909, which is the final section of the act and which begins on line 11: Here we provide that the Secretary of State must submit to Congress semiannual reports of expenditures made and activities carried on under the authority of H. R. 3342. In addition we must appropriate the money specifically for every activity under the act at the beginning of each fiscal year. Thus we will be kept fully and currently informed and advised as to what is being done and we can and will govern ourselves accordingly when the annual appropriation bills come before Congress. The Congress and the country will be kept advised concerning the achievements and the operations of this program. By this device the full force of public opinion and congressional authority becomes one final safeguard to make certain the United States Office of Information and Educational Exchange is being wisely and effectively operated on a broad program to help preserve the peace and to maintain a climate of public opinion everywhere which will be conducive to the attitudes and understandings which are essential if war is to be permanently averted.

Mr. Chairman, in one way or another I have worked on and toward this legislation since early in 1943, when I introduced my first bill on this general theme. We have won a great war at colossal cost in life and limb and fortune. Can we now win the peace? If so, can we hold it secure and make it permanent? Talk and good intentions and negative attitudes alone will neither outwit nor outlast communism, and they will never outlaw war. We must do something affirmative and positive and American if this last great bastion of freedom in all the world is not to succumb to the stresses, the strains, and the seductions of our day and time. Through the program outlined in detail in H. R. 3342 we establish a mechanism and authorize the machinery for waging a crusade for peace. Its cost is less than insignificant as compared with just 1 year's preparedness for war, to say nothing of just 1 day's participation in the type of conflict which next will come if we fail in our efforts for peace. Surely it is worth the trial. We Americans have led the world in education, in production, in government, in our standards of living, and in our standards of justice. Now, if ever, we have a chance to lead the world toward a way of life and a type of understanding which will win and sustain the peace. H. R. 3342 can be our first big definite self-sustained step in that direction. It is a start up the trail leading to an objective which all Americans hold dear—that of eternal peace.

Do some of you say this is impossible? Do some argue it is not worth ten or twenty or thirty million dollars a year to try? Are there faint-hearted among you who believe this challenge is too great to attempt? Because it has never been done must we believe it can never be? Is there any good reason not to start that which has already been too long delayed? I urge you to be citizens of great faith. Certainly an era which can produce the jet-propelled plane, the death ray, and the atom bomb can conquer the problem of the boundary line. Are we to let imaginary lines scrawled by mere man across the face of the earth hold us back from conquering what at most is but a mental attitude in an age when we are actually conquering the space between the planets?

Mr. Chairman, we dare not fail to try every reasonable expedient to preserve the peace. No man can say that anything which promotes mutual understanding and cements friendships is not a deterrent to war. And, sir, unless all of human history is a fictitious mockery it stands unchallenged and unchallengeable that anything which eradicates misunderstandings and erases skepticisms helps create the environment in which friendship and prevailing understandings thrive. Today, all I ask you to do is to make the effort.

I ask you to have courage and confiddence and conviction enough to try something different to help avert war and to help promote peace. I ask you to try this not as a substitute for anything—it is not proposed in lieu of armies or navies or soldiers or bombs or the United Nations—it is proposed as something additional, as a supplement to what we are already doing which if it succeeds can win for every country the security which no country in the history of the world has up to now enjoyed. I urge you to enlist in this ethical echelon in the battle for peace not in the terms of what it might cost to conduct the campaign but in the tragic terms of what it might cost if we fail in our over-all efforts to make this peace a permanent thing. I urge your support for H. R. 3342.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, I have been impressed in recent weeks and months with the general agreement among the American people, and also within the Congress itself that there is need for such a program as is proposed in this bill.

A good many people have expressed doubt about the way this program has been or will be conducted. Some Members of Congress have criticized some of the personnel connected with the undertaking. So I wish to confine my remarks right now to that phase of the question.

There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that the loyalty of these people must be unquestioned because they are the voice of America, they operate the conduit through which that voice is to be made felt throughout the world. There is no question about that. I think we all agree on that.

I believe every Member of the House will agree that we are fortunate in having in charge of the State Department at this time one of the great Americans of all time. Someone said a minute ago: "Well, General Marshall is a great man, his loyalty is unquestioned, but he cannot look after everything in his Department." Why, of course, he cannot. When General Marshall was Chief of Staff he could not personally lead the Normandy invasion and he did not, but he selected a good man to do it and he gave that man over-all supervision to perform that operation. General Eisenhower, who was our leader in the European theater, could not personally conduct all of the operations in connection with the Battle of the Bulge, but he selected a good man to command there and he kept in close touch with the operation and with the conduct of that battle.

Anyone who knows General Marshall intimately knows that when it comes to the selection of good men to work under him he is an expert, and they also know that he does not hesitate to fire any man he believes cannot fill the bill. Someone has said: "You will have a personnel man down there under General Marshall." You have. The Assistant Secretary of State in charge of administraton is General Marshall's right-hand man. His name is John Peurifoy.

Let me tell you about John Peurifoy. I have known him many years, and his family all of my life. He is from South Carolina. His forebears came to this countr. 150 years before the American Revolution and their descendents have served this country faithfully, as leaders, in war and in peace, ever since. There is no question, there can be none, of John Peurifoy's loyalty, character, and outstanding ability.

Let me tell you what John Peurifoy did, General Marshall's personal appointee, the first thing after he went into this job. He called up the FBI and said: "I want you to investigate me. I have a tough job to do and to do it well my loyalty to our Government must be above suspicion. I want you to investigate me and everybody down here."

And in passing may I say that since General Marshall was appointed Secretary of State he has himself requested of the Attorney General that top priority be given to the investigation of the loyalty, patriotism, and Americanism of every employee in the State Department.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, this bill goes a little too far in one respect.

I am going to vote for the bill, but I voted for an amendment in the committee, and I am going to offer that amendment here, to make what I consider a fairer bill. This bill goes a long way. It says that the Secretary of State can employ no one under this program until the Federal Bureau of Investigation has investigated him as to his loyalty. That is all right. I am for that. The Federal Bureau of Investigation is a fact-finding agency. The Federal Bureau of Investigation has peculiar facilities to find facts about anything or anybody. But, the Federal Bureau of Investigation is not a quasi judicial agency, and I am against the provision requiring that the FBI certify an applicant before the Secretary of State can employ him. I think the bill as written is a reflection on the Secretary of State though not intended to be.

If we cannot have more confidence in the Secretary of State, whether he is a Democrat or Republican, this Government is in a pretty bad way. It is my purpose at the proper time to offer an amendment to correct this situation.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I think that I share with the gentleman the high degree of admiration that every Member of the Congress has for General Marshall, and I think we applaud the committee in its care with which they are going to scrutinize the selection of people who work on this program. I have listened very carefully to the gentleman's remarks as well as the remarks made by the gentleman from South Dakota. There is one thing that still puzzles me and which has not been touched upon. Who listens to the Voice of America? What information does the committee have before it that would indicate to the House what people of what countries to which these broadcasts are beamed actually hear the programs?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself five additional minutes.

In reply to my distinguished friend, I would say that people all over the world are listening to the Voice of America. The Department gets 25,000 letters a week about the program from abroad. It costs 30 cents apiece to mail them from foreign countries all over the world. That is evidence in itself that foreign peoples are listening to the Voice of America. And we have unlimited other evidence, and I hope we will have time to present some of it to the Members today. But I wanted to return to this matter of personnel because it has been harped on so much.

There is one man who has been identified with this undertaking, pilloried by some, and I think very unjustly, William Benton, Assistant Secretary of State. He has been in charge of this program for 20 months.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDS. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. I am very much pleased that the gentleman should take the time to express his confidence in Mr. Benton, who heads this activity in the State Department. I should like to say that I know Mr. Benton. I do not believe there is anybody in the entire country that approaches him in the qualifications needed for this particular work. I believe he is the best man that could possibly be found.

Mr. RICHARDS. I thank the gentleman for that.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDS. I do not want to yield any more.

Mr. Benton has shown himself to be an unselfish, patriotic, progressive, outstanding, and loyal American citizen. He has done a wonderful job in this thing. Some people in this Congress and some people in the country have intimated that it might be necessary to throw Mr. William Benton to the wolves in order to get the opposition to accept this program but I for one am not willing to throw him to the wolves, because he has made America Voice-of-America conscious. He is the one who has constantly dinned it into Americans that even during peacetime we have a battle on our hands, that we must get across the American viewpoint to the other people of the world in order that they may get a true picture of the kind of people we are, what we believe in, and what we stand for.

Bill Benton does not need this job; he took it only to render service to his country. He was a successful businessman long before he was selected to put across the Voice of America; and he has really put it across whether you like all of his methods or not.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-one Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JENKINS of Ohio, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 3342, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, when 312 Members responded to their names—a quorum—and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Committee will resume its sitting.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, as I was saying when the point of order was made, there are certain factors that have made the American people conscious of the worth of a program like this. I mentioned Mr. Benton's great work, the general confidence in the Secretary of State, and a few other factors. But I think the conversion of the American people to the need of a program like this is due, more than anything else, to the present-day policy of Russia. General Marshall has testified that we are being lied about and maligned throughout the world by certain nations antagonistic to our form of government and our way of life. The worst view of our life is being shown to other peoples in the hope that they will lose confidence in our system and that the totalitarian system will be exalted. We must combat it. We must realize the importance of this great dynamic force, air waves and radio.

Many nations have used it during the last 10 or 15 years, in war and in peace. Hitler softened up his intended victims by propaganda programs sent through the air, not truths such as we want to tell about America but a gilded view of the kind of government dictators intended to foist upon the world. Japan used it to soften up her enemies in the Far East. Mussolini used it in his Mediterranean conquests. Russia is using it. We do not know how much Russia is spending on a program like this but we do know that it has been testified by people who should know that they are spending more than all the other nations of the world combined. England is spending forty or fifty million dollars to give the people of the world her conception of a proper kind of democratic government and democratic life. It would be folly for this great American Nation, dedicated to liberty and justice, to refuse to defend itself by the spoken word.

May I say here that everyone on the Committee on Foreign Affairs is convinced of the worth of this program. It is not a partisan program. The foreign policy of the United States is nonpartisan. This is an American program, and I believe it is entitled to your support.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUDD. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I trust that the gentleman will enlarge on the question I asked the preceding speaker, about what people in what countries hear the Voice of America. That has not yet been developed.

Mr. JUDD. One of the other members of the committee, I believe, will deal with that. I want to approach it from a little different angle.

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUDD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BREHM. The gentleman from South Carolina said that Hitler and Mussolini used this program. I simply hope the gentleman will explain that the same thing will not happen to us that happened to them by using the program.

Mr. JUDD. The program that we intend to use is totally different from that which Hitler and Mussolini used. Their purpose was to bewilder and mislead peoples to soften them up and extend control over them by a series of lies and incessant repetition of the lies. If we were to try to outdo the Nazis in lying, to misrepresent rather than accurately present America it would, of course, be utterly indefensible and contemptible. I would not vote 1 cent of the taxpayers' money for any such purpose. Fortunately we do not have to go out and lie about America. What we have to do is to present the truth. But we have to do it repeatedly and effectively.

When I see the magnificent job of salesmanship the Fascists and the Nazis and the Communists have done for such rotten products, I am ashamed that we, with such a good product, have on the whole done such a poor job of salesmanship, have been so almost apologetic about the system of government that has given a better life to its citizens than any other in history.

I want to devote my remarks at this time in the general debate to a discussion, insofar as I am capable of it, of the basic philosophy underlying this proposal, and also of the contention made several times today, that if we have a good product it will sell itself, that we do not need to tell the story to the people of other countries.

If a person can get two bars of soap and can try out both of them, he will choose the product he finds is the better. But hundreds of millions of people today are not in a position to sample for themselves what life is like under our American flag, under freedom. They have to depend on the reports that come to them, and the other side is giving them distorted reports 24 hours a day. If people hear only lies that are big enough and told often enough, how can they escape being confused?

I submit it is not a tenable position to argue that just because we have a better system, of course, everybody in the world knows it. The fact remains that a lot of people in the world do not know it.

A friend of mine just came home from a visit to south China. He was born out there. He knows the language. He went to his native place in the interior where he was brought up as a boy and where he knew the people and they knew him. He sent me some of the questions that the people asked him: "Is it true that the Americans have turned over the occupation of Japan to Russia? Is it true that all American forces have been withdrawn from Japan leaving the running of the country to the Japanese? Is it true that American troops in China number 100,000?"

He said that some Chinese told him they had heard we had up to 3,000,000 troops there when actually we have less than 10,000.

"Is it true that American troops murder, rape, and maim an average of one Chinese every day?"

Of course it is impossible to have troops in any country without some mishaps, even crimes. Every one of them can be built up all out of proportion by an enemy of our way of life.

My friend was asked: "Is it true that the new Sino-American commercial treaty makes China a vassal of America?"

In that new treaty, China made some concessions and we made some concessions. Yet only the report of the concessions that China made goes out in Communist propaganda, and America is portrayed as a cruel imperialistic nation forcing her will on weaker nations. They know America was not like that in the past, but after the Yalta betrayal, it is understandable that their confidence in us can be shaken by such propaganda.

Mr. Chairman, it is not enough for us to have a good product. We have to present it. Our good deed is not enough if they do not know about it. Or the deed may be interpreted as having ulterior motives if we do not take the trouble to explain why we did it.

Something which, if done to us, would mean to us that the individual or nation which did it is our friend, may perhaps be interpreted by those with a totally different background and set of values, as indicating that the doer is an enemy.

Until the Teheran and Yalta Conferences the United States had come as near to living by the Golden Rule in its international relations as any nation in history. But sometimes I wonder if we really understand the Golden Rule. We read it and interpret it just as it is ordinarily written: Do unto others as you would have them do unto you. That is adequate when we are dealing with people having the same background and set of values as ourselves; but when we are dealing with people of a totally different background, then we have to understand its true meaning which is: Do unto others as you would have them do unto you—if you were they. That is a very different thing.

Often we have not taken the trouble to project ourselves in our imagination over into their way of thinking, so we can see ourselves and our deeds as they see them. But only as we do that can we present our way of life—how we got the way we are and why—in such a way that they understand us and what we do.

Our forefathers came to this country in the beginning because they had an idea, a vision, which they were unable to work out in Europe. They came here to plant and develop that idea—human freedom and political equality. They had two wide oceans between them and the rest of the world. Then the steam engine was invented and they put it into boats to make steamships, which destroyed the oceans as barriers. Then we invented the airplane, the rocket, and ultimately the atomic bomb. Thus with our own inventions we ate up the cake of our physical separation from the rest of the world, but still, nostalgically, thought we had it.

Sometimes I wish we had a planet all by ourselves. But I know that being Americans we would not be happy if we had such a planet. We would lie awake at night on that planet thinking up some way to get over to this planet and start doing business with it.

Surely Pearl Harbor proved that no matter how much we may want to ignore the rest of the world, the rest of the world is not going to ignore us. Now, if it is not going to ignore us and we have to deal with it, then we want to deal with it in such ways as to promote the security and prosperity and well-being of the United States.

There are four main means by which we can deal with the rest of the world, four measures by which we can try to influence favorably the thinking, ideas, and attitudes of the people around the world.

First, by diplomatic measures—the strength and skill of our diplomacy.

Second, by military measures—the strength of our military organization and the skill with which we handle it at the right times.

Third, by our economic and financial measures—the strength of our economy and the skill with which we handle our economic relations with the rest of the world.

Fourth, by ideological measures—the strength and attractiveness of our ideas and the skill with which we present them. This, of course, does not take the place of and cannot do the work of the other three, but it is an important part of the total scope of our contacts with the rest of the world, and it can greatly assist the other three.

More and more countries are spending more and more money each year on this means of trying to influence other nations and peoples. France is spending on propaganda abroad 30 percent of her total foreign office budget. If we were to do as much in the ideological field as France, we would have to spend almost a third of the total appropriations for our State Department.

Russia is spending more on it than any other nation. Why? Because her rulers know what one man, Karl Marx, did with an idea, and what Lenin and Stalin have done with that idea. They saw what Hitler did with an idea. They know what the Pilgrims, when they came to this country over 300 years ago, did with an idea.

The great heroes in Russia today are not industrial magnates or scientists; they are not the great generals. The heroes in Russia today, and the highest paid persons in the land, are the skillful users of words, those who know how to take an idea and, whether true or false, present it in an attractive, convincing form. They have learned it is their most potent and effective weapon throughout the world. Surely we have learned it is their most dangerous weapon. And yet some are saying it is needless and useless for us to do anything at all in this particular field of activity.

Mr. Chairman, I think we have to give the Russians credit for doing an extraordinarily skillful job in presenting their ideas to the rest of the world. For example, at San Francisco, at Moscow, at London, at Paris, at Lake Success, one of their delegates at least three times a week gets up and makes a speech in which he launches attacks on us for lynchings in America, our alleged imperialism in China or Korea, what we allegedly are doing in the islands of the Pacific, or the Middle East, or Latin America, our so-called dollar imperialism and so on. They keep the world's attention so focused on the alleged evils—and some of them are there—of our western civilization that millions of people all over the world, including the United States, fail to note, or at least to appreciate fully, the fact that Russia herself is forcing on all her neighbors as cruel and ruthless and utterly despotic an imperialism as any the world has ever known.

It was gratifying to read last fall that one day in the assembly of the United Nations, after the Russian delegate had got through with his usual denunciation of American "imperialism," Mrs. Roosevelt got up and said, "Just because you say it every day does not make it true." Well, if it takes so long for Americans to see through the humbug—and many Americans are still taken in by it—what can you expect of persons in the interior of Europe or Asia, who have little or no background of knowledge by which to judge all the charges and lies; no standard by which to measure the propaganda against us. The testimony is overwhelming that it is increasingly effective. Are we not to make an effort to present the truth, to say nothing of an effort to correct the untruths?

Mr. Chairman, I have had some experience in this field, because I spent the best 10 years of my life in this business of trying to spread ideas. I was a missionary in China. Some spread ideas by speaking or preaching. You long ago discovered that that was not the way for me to go about it. Some did it by teaching, and it is a good way.

Some did it through agricultural and industrial work, giving people better crops and tools, more food and better living conditions as the means of proclaiming and demonstrating their Christian faith.

It was through medical work, bringing to people better physical and mental and I hope spiritual health that I tried to spread the ideas I believe are the most important truths in the world.

The great Teacher said, "You shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free."

I believe that—believe that the truth and the truth alone will make men free. But how can it make men free if they do not know it? And how can they know the truth if they do not hear it? And how can they hear it if nobody tells it?

Mr. Chairman, there can be no question as to the need for the activities proposed in this bill—their importance in the world-wide struggle between freedom and slavery. What we must now determine is whether the measures authorized are the best way to meet the need.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD] has expired.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 13 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD].

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I think that the passage of this bill is of vital importance to this country in spreading the truth and nothing but the truth to all of the other countries in the world.

This bill is not aimed only at the dissemination of information into Russia. That, of course, is a part of the whole world picture, and I think it is tremendously important if we are going to continue to send relief abroad and to appropriate huge sums of money for that purpose, and to appropriate something like $400,000,000 for Greece and Turkey. At the same time we ought to tell the people throughout the world just what America is, just what we stand for, just what we intend to do.

I do not believe in the window or show type of propaganda. I believe that the best type of propaganda is to tell the truth; and, as the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota has just stated, the truth will make you free.

I have been somewhat disturbed in the consideration of this bill by statements both direct and indirect made against the director of this particular branch of the State Department. Attacking a governmental activity by attacking its leader is, of course, nothing new in politics, and it has become a familiar technique; but I feel that we are extremely fortunate to have such an individual as Bill Benton as director of this particular program in view of the fact that he has a splendid business background to back up what he has already accomplished. I wish to refer the membership of this House to a statement which appeared in the Washington Post of May 17, 1947, and which can be found on pages 198 and 199 of the hearings, a statement signed by such individuals as Mr. Paul G. Hoffman, president of the Studebaker Corp.; Mr. Ralph E. Flanders, a Member of the other body; Mr. Eric Johnston, president of the Motion Pictures Association; by Will D. Fuller, president of the Curtis Publishing Co.; and by Miriam B. Folsom, treasurer of the Eastman Kodak Co. These gentlemen are men who know Mr. Benton very well. They are individuals who have worked with him in private business and they tell us in no uncertain terms of their confidence in his ability. For the benefit of the membership of the House I wish to quote a few lines from the article which appeared in the Post of that date. They said:

> We are five of the men who have worked most closely with Bill Benton in various civic activities. The kind of criticism that is now being leveled at Bill Benton is the kind of thing that keeps responsible and able people from going into Government work.

I might interpolate to say there that despite the fact that Mr. Benton has been charged with being an associate of Mr. Chester Bowles, that as a matter of fact there had been no connection between these two people for over 12 years. In 1935 Mr. Benton left the firm of Benton and Bowles, went to the University of Chicago where he served as vice president, and from that position he was asked by his Government to accept his present position in the State Department. I think also it might be well to bring out that Mr. Benton has a real American background. As a boy before the First World War he left Minnesota with his family and migrated to Montana where he helped to prove up on a dry land homestead. I think that indicates quite clearly the type of individual with whom we have to work, an individual who believes primarily in the efficacy and worthwhileness of private enterprise, a man who has come into the Government at a loss as far as he is concerned financially, and a man who has contributed of his great ability to the development of a program that is necessary for the welfare of this country.

I sometimes wonder why some men come into the Government to work, and at other times I wonder why once we get a good man he stays with us, because so many of them have had to take too much in the way of abuse from Members of Congress, and they have been in a position where they have been unable to defend themselves. I think we ought to try and be fair and impartial in considering a program of this kind.

Bill Benton is being blamed for a lot of wartime ghosts for which he was not responsible. Many Members of Congress hated the OWI, and are blaming Benton for that. Many Members of Congress did not like Nelson Rockefeller's operation in Latin America, and now they are blaming Bill Benton for that. Many Members of Congress did not like Bill Benton's predecessor, Archie MacLeish, and they blame Bill Benton for that. We are not voting on OWI today. We are not voting on Nelson Rockefeller's wartime operations. We are not voting on Archibald MacLeish. We are voting on a proposed information program in the State Department which began after the war was over.

A prominent Senator remarked recently that if Benton had come to Washington as an unknown man, and started a completely new organization, he could have made 100 times as many mistakes, and would still have only one-hundredth as much criticism. He is not criticized for his mistakes, but rather for the ghosts which preceded him.

Bill Benton in 20 months has reduced the personnel from 11,000 to 3,000. Bill Benton is trying to bring into effect a new program, to pick the best, and the highest type of personnel, and to give to the people of all the world the kind of a picture of America that we want him to give, a fair, impartial, and unbiased picture.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. I think the gentleman should add to his very fine statement that Mr. Benton had no connection with the OWI at any time, in any way, at any place.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

One of the things in connection with this bill has to do with the exchange of students.

EFFECTIVENESS OF STUDENT EXCHANGES

First. Here is the story of one student. In 1936 a man from Afghanistan came to the United States to study engineering. He obtained his degree at Massachusetts Institute of Technology and spent a year of training at Denver, in the laboratories of the Bureau of Reclamation. The man then returned to his native Afghanistan, where Japanese engineers were employed in many key government jobs. When war broke out between Japan and the United States, the Japanese were expelled by the Afghan government, and this American trained engineer was appointed Minister of Public Works. He called for American advisers. Last year this former American student gave a contract to a New York engineering company for $16,000,000 to construct a dam in Afghanistan. The exchange of students is good business. It also has produced an important leader in a key country, bordering on the Soviet Union.

Second. The exchange of students has a measurable effect upon the political attitudes of students who study under a democratic system. Of the 19 German students who went to Oxford on Rhodes scholarships before the recent war, 15 were anti-Nazi throughout the war. My authority is a report by the Secretary of the Rhodes Trust, quoted in the London Times last December 21. There is no question that the political views of students who study abroad is greatly influenced in favor of the country which provides the education. If the United States is out to make political friends, I do not know a better way than through the exchange of students.

Mr. Chairman, some mention has been made of the use of private agencies and personnel in this particular part of the State Department. I would like to bring to the attention of the House the fact that for 6 years the Department of State has been placing contracts with the Institute of International Education, a nonprofit organization in New York, to supervise scholarships for foreign students.

Also for 6 years the State Department has been using the American Library Association for various tasks in the field of books and libraries. At one time the association administered the three American libraries in Latin America as a "pilot" operation in the absence of a professionally qualified administrative staff in the Department, but it gave up that responsibility in line with its stated policy of not engaging in long-term commitments for administration of such programs. The Library Association continuously consults and advises the State Department on books which are sent abroad.

The American Council on Education has been supervising the State Department's aid to American schools in Latin America. Mr. Roy Tasco Davis, well known formerly as United States Minister in Central America and director of a private school in Maryland, has headed that work under the American Council on Education.

The State Department has given a contract for the past 3 years to Science Service, Inc., a private organization, to select and translate American scientific books into Spanish and Portuguese.

The State Department's broadcasting operations, as you know, are to a large extent carried out by private radio companies, operating under contract with the State Department. All the radio transmitters are managed by private companies, and approximately half of all broadcasting programs are prepared by private companies.

The State Department has obtained 16-millimeter educational films from more than 100 American companies and private organizations. All new motion pictures required by the State Department for distribution in foreign countries are produced by private film companies.

The practice of looking first to a private agency has been a policy of the State Department for a number of years.

Other Government agencies which participate in this program are also utilizing private services. The Department of Agriculture has utilized the services abroad of staff members of 26 of the 48 land-grant colleges.

Last year, for example, the Department of Agriculture had survey missions in three foreign countries. The mission to China was headed by Dean Hutchins, vice president of the University of California. The mission to the Arab states was headed by President Harris, Utah State Agriculture College. The mission to the Philippines was headed by Dean Call, of the University of Kansas. It is natural that the Government turns to the great agricultural colleges for help.

Of course, there will always be a residue of this information and educational work which no private agency can handle. The magazine Amerika, which the State Department sends to Russia, is necessarily a Government magazine because the Soviet Government does not permit the circulation in that country of private American magazines.

Also, when a foreign government asks for training in census taking, or weather forecasting, or public-health administration, it is natural that experienced personnel for such services are most likely to be found within the Government than outside because of the unique public nature of such work.

The point I want to make is that the use of private agencies is not a new policy. It is a policy already in daily use.

In conclusion, I would like to call to the attention of the committee the fact that we have the approval of all the private broadcasting companies and by and large the great majority of newspaper publishers and editors. They have indicated their belief in the need for a program such as this, and I sincerely hope the House will see fit to pass this measure overwhelmingly.

Mr. Chairman, under unanimous consent granted me previously, I am inserting at this point a series of articles and letters having to do with the business under discussion:

A START TOWARD UNDERSTANDING

AN INTIMATE MESSAGE FROM WASHINGTON

(By Neal Stanford)

WASHINGTON.—The fact that Voice of America short-wave broadcasts are now expected to continue in one form or another is as much to the credit of Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower as to anybody. His brief testimony on the Hill the other day on why the Voice of America should not be silenced was impressive and effective. It was simple, straightforward, and persuasive. In fact, because it was so effective and revealing, your correspondent is taking the liberty of paraphrasing the high lights of General Eisenhower's brief testimony.

I have sat with some of my fine friends in the Russian Army by the hour trying to explain to them the basis of our Government. They simply cannot understand such things as our idea of a free press, one that can publish what it pleases, coupled, of course, with responsibility for the truthfulness of its reporting. They simply say: "If you were real friends of ours, you would not allow such and such a thing to go out."

There nothing has a right to be in these broadcasts but fact and truth. If you do not stick to fact, soon you will become aware of disbeliefs. It will recoil on you and defeat you if you try to get slick about this thing. It must be true.

These programs must be persistent and be put out by persons who know what will appeal to the audiences they are trying to reach. There is no use talking academic principles to someone thinking in terms of food, clothing, and what you get for your day's work. We don't realize that in Russia people are living six and seven in a room; that they let out space by the cubic meter and not by the room. It should impress them to know that here a man can have a cottage, a car, or a refrigerator.

When I met the Russians in Berlin, I wanted to arrange an exchange of visitors. I thought it would be a good thing. So one day I invited each other country to send 100 officers into our area to see what they wanted. The Russian member, a friend of mine, was disturbed and objected, so I said: "All right; I will withdraw your invitation." But he said: "I want an invitation."

Afterward he came to me and said he was embarrassed and had something to explain. "For 25 years," he said, "we have been surrounded by enemies. We had no friends. The result is we have trained every Russian soldier that everybody is his enemy—everybody who is not a Russian. Therefore, if I invite your men to come down as freely in my sector as you are asking mine into yours, we will have incidents. They will be shot. We will have all kinds of trouble."

For the first time I began to understand this fellow's problem. He was trying to meet on a friendly halfway basis but the teachings of his people for the past 25 years would not let him.

I do not believe the Russian people really know our atomic bomb proposals. Things like that are not disseminated in that country as in ours. For instance, we actually had Russian soldiers honestly asking us, when we met them in Vienna: "Where did the Americans get so many Russian jeeps?" You see, they operate under a different system. It is not considered necessary to tell them so many things.

Every capital in the world knows the facts about our military situation as of this minute. There is no question about it. Their military people know we are disarmed.

I think there should be reciprocity in all these things—exchange of scientists, observers, students, etc. It is a thing that establishes good faith.

I know that even when we are telling the truth we will be accused of telling lies. They will do that for a long time. But what we are trying to do is make a start in promoting a condition that will be favorable and in which the peaceful idea can grow. We cannot expect to reach these people quickly and on a very broad basis at first.

There will be disappointments, but if we stick to the truth, and use every possible means of exchanging truths with other peoples, we cannot but help add advantages to ourselves. There can be no absolute security for the United States until every nation enjoys a comparable feeling of security. All that arms can do is give you a relative feeling of security. I do not care how many guns and planes and ships you pool. Only as we get a common basis of believing in each other, do you have security. Then I can go fishing.

COMMITTEE FOR UNITED STATES INFORMATION ABROAD,
Washington, D. C., June 2, 1947.

The Honorable MIKE MANSFIELD,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. MANSFIELD: The Committee for United States Information Abroad has been formed by a group of citizens who have learned from personal experience that it is important to explain ourselves to foreign countries. To quote General Eisenhower in his statement in support of the Mundt bill, we are "constantly struck by the appalling ignorance that exists throughout the world about the United States; things that we take so much for granted that we do not even think about them are completely unknown to much of the world."

We think it is vital to tell the people of the world what the people of the United States are like, how they live, what they think, what they believe. It is vital to share our knowledge with them, and bring theirs to us.

The United States policy of extending aid to free nations makes no sense unless we also export American ideas. We are convinced that if the true purposes of the United States are known and understood around the world, that we will have friends around the world. We are also convinced that if we allow any distortion of those purposes and ideals through propaganda around the world, without correction, then the responsibility for that distortion and the danger it represents, is partly ours.

The United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1947, H. R. 3342, known as the Mundt bill, provides the basis for continuing a constructive program, including the exchange of students, teachers, and technical persons abroad, as well as the Voice of America broadcasts.

We are well aware that there have been criticisms of part of the activities now carried on by the State Department. We think also there may be certain changes needed in the proposed legislation. Such corrections can be made without altering the purpose of the bill. It is most urgent now to take necessary steps to avoid complete disruption of the program.

We therefore strongly urge you to support this legislation, as requested by Secretary of State Marshall.

Sincerely yours,

COMMITTEE FOR UNITED STATES INFORMATION ABROAD,
Washington, D. C., June 3, 1947.

The Honorable MIKE MANSFIELD,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MANSFIELD: I have learned from some Members of Congress that some confusion exists between the Mundt bill, H. R. 3342, and an international radio broadcasting measure pending before the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

This confusion should be cleared up before the vote on the Mundt bill this week. I have made inquiries at the State Department and have obtained the following information:

On March 24 and 25 the Acting Secretary of State sent to Congress two proposed bills, both relating to broadcasting. The first measure would give to the Secretary of State general authority for conducting an international information program, including broadcasting. This proposal was redrafted and introduced by Representative MUNDT, and is now on the House Calendar. The proposed legislation being considered by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee concerns broadcasting alone, which it would place in a federally chartered corporation to be known as the International Broadcasting Foundation. It has not yet been introduced as a bill and no hearings have been held.

Passage of the Mundt bill will in no way prejudice the consideration at a later date of the International Broadcasting Foundation. The two bills supplement each other and both are sponsored by the Secretary of State. Also, as I understand it, the provision in H. R. 3342, which would authorize broadcasting, might still be needed if the Foundation proposal were later passed, if (as I presume everyone would concede to be necessary) the State Department would still participate in preparation of the broadcasts, at least at the policy level.

As chairman of the Committee for United States Information Abroad, I again urge you to support the Mundt bill, and to assist in correcting any misunderstanding concerning its relation to the International Radio Foundation proposal.

Sincerely,

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. JACKSON], a very valuable member of the subcommittee working on this legislation.

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Chairman, to possibly repeat a few remarks I made this morning before a very small but select audience as the House convened, I should like to say again that since I have been a Member of the House of Representatives I have heard a great many palpable misstatements and inaccuracies made on the floor regarding pending legislation. It is my very sincere opinion that more half truths, more vagaries and more prejudices have been aired in connection with the so-called Voice of America program than on any other single legislative topic. So violent and so entirely likely have been some of the allegations made that when I originally found myself appointed as a member of the subcommittee under my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], I was completely predisposed against the measure and personally convinced that the material being broadcast to foreign nations was not only ill-conceived and presented with an unbelievably high degree of stupidity, but actually subversive and tending to destroy the very foundation of this country.

The initial hearings before the subcommittee served to dispel much of the confusion existing in my mind relative to what has already been done and what is presently contemplated for the future. In full justice to the critics of the program it must be admitted that some mistakes and errors have been made. However, it also might well be pointed out that errors, inconsistencies and faulty judgments are not completely and entirely limited to the confines of the State Department or to Mr. Secretary Benton. A careful examination of the facts might even prove that some of the opponents of this measure have not always been entirely accurate in their statements, nor have they always been infallible in their considered judgments.

In proposing a program of cultural exchange between this country and other nations we on the committee have attempted always to keep in mind one basic, fundamental thought. We have, as I said this morning, only one thing to sell to the world, and to the gentleman who said, "When you sell a thing you lose possession of it," I should like to point out that the men who first brought Christianity to the world did not lose possession of it. It grew to something bigger and finer than they had ever conceived it could or would. The men who have sold liberty and freedom in this land have not lost it. Our forefathers who sold the first doctrines of a representative government did not lose it, but we stand in danger of losing it and we stand in very serious danger today. What we conceive to be unfettered freedom of action for the individual under law is what we have to sell to the world. You can call it liberty, call it the democratic process, call it the American way, or call it anything else, it still remains the one commodity we have to vend.

Mr. NIXON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of California. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. NIXON. The gentleman has been discussing what America has to sell on these programs. Has the gentleman any evidence as to how successful the means of selling has been? What kind of audience has been built up for these programs?

Mr. JACKSON of California. I am very grateful the gentleman has brought up this point. To digress for just a moment on that question, the public-opinion poll conducted by the War Department in the American zone of occupied Germany last year showed that 75 percent of all radios in the American zone are used for listening to the Voice of America. This was an increase of 12 percent over the preceding year.

A public-opinion poll in Budapest, Hungary, last November showed that there were 100,000 licensed radio sets. Of these, 62,000 could pick up short-wave broadcasts, and 43,000 were actually listening to the Voice of America.

The State Department last year received 60,000 letters from foreign lands relative to the Voice of America radio program. These letters made specific comment on the programs. I do not think there is any question but that the Voice of America is being listened to, and listened to most widely.

There is slight disagreement on the basic premise that this program is desirable. Few indeed are those who would claim that such a program is unnecessary or undesirable. The basic issues have been confused, however, as is so often the case, with personalities and with questions of ability and selectivity and questions of procedure. We cannot toot upon a tin whistle in a world of percussions and brasses. We are dealing and we shall continue to deal for many years to come with a world in which every effort is being made to subjugate peoples by men who use ignorance as a weapon to defeat life and freedom and peace, by men who use hatred, bigotry, and intolerance to subjugate the minds of men. The danger we seek to avert by this program is not directed against chains upon human hands, for unfortunately most of the world today is under chains. Rather we fight against the bondage of human minds which follows as a natural result of ignorance of other people, their habits, and their respective ways of life.

We propose under the terms of this bill, H. R. 3342, to attack this ignorance on the part of others with every weapon of enlightenment on which we can lay our hands. It has been truly said that to know a man is to like him. Can we afford not to tell the world about America, about our true aspirations, our true purposes, and our prized liberties, when the press and the radio of other lands through 24 hours of every day cry out a program of hatred, falsification, vilification, and calumny?

If General Motors can spend $15,000,000 a year to advertise automobiles, can we do less to advertise freedom of speech, press, and worship? If Procter & Gamble can spend $21,000,000 a year to advertise bubbles and lathers, can we do less for a world nurturing a hope of freedom than to tell them about schools, churches, farms, and homes in the very cradle of liberty?

Take the magazine America. I have here one of the most recent issues. Do any of the gentlemen take exception to the content matter? Is this anything tending to undermine and destroy democracy and freedom? It tells about Abraham Lincoln, letter carriers, vacuum cleaners, electric irons, threshing machines, lawn mowers, trucks, and farms. In Russia there is a circulation of 50,000 copies of this magazine, and they are dog-eared and tattered before the last person has read them. They are passed from hand to hand until they are completely worn out. It unveils to the people of Russia a world of which they have never dreamed, a world of which they have never heard, a world in which a man is a creature of human dignity and of personal opinion and in which machines do the work done elsewhere by human backs. Can anyone imagine that this revelation could fail to have a strong, moving impact upon people whose minds have been closed to the subjects given herein? Is this un-American? Is this something which tends to destroy freedom?

The last page in the magazine is on the Declaration of American Independence, and it starts out with words like these:

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal and that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, and that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Certainly that is not subversive and does not tend to tear down the things that we have.

Why do Communists find it necessary to reindoctrinate and reorientate soldiers of the Red Army who return to Russia? Why has it been found necessary to almost drive some of them back to a life which they once accepted with docile compliance?

Mr. Chairman, those who know attribute the defection of their loyalties to the sudden and moving discovery that outside the borders of their own land there is a world full of amazing and wonderful things, a world brought forcibly to their attention by their service during the war.

What moves a member of the Russian Embassy, working in the Russian Embassy, a Russian, to fill his brief case with secrets stolen from the Canadian Government under the very eyes of his colleagues and return them to the Canadian Government? What else but a feeling of new friendship discovered in a world he never knew existed?

That is what we are trying to take to these people.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JARMAN].

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JARMAN. I gladly yield to the distinguished chairman of our subcommittee.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, I want to announce to the Members of the House since I notice several gentleman looking at copies of the magazine America that we have some extra copies here which contain the complete English translation which will be much more intelligible to the Members than if they merely look at the Russian language.

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Chairman, reference was made during the discussion of the rule today to the increase in the cost of the State Department since 1940. I believe it was about 500 percent. I can but call attention to the increase in the cost of the War and Navy Departments during that time. These increases are, by and large, of exactly the same pattern and for the same reason.

Reference was also made to the fact that this information program is a new one. That is quite true. The testimony of General Eisenhower before our committee when he was asked that direct question by me was to the effect that we in the United States, and the United States Army particularly, gained a realization of the value of such a program for the first time from the Germans during the war. Yes, it is a new program.

Now, we passed an appropriation bill here yesterday for upwards of $5,000,000,000 for the War Department. The State Department has asked, as our distinguished chairman has said, for only $31,000,000 for this program, which is infinitesimal by comparison, I repeat, even if the House should grant the entire amount.

Many of you will remember that a bill similar to this was under consideration by the Seventy-ninth Congress, practically throughout its existence. Exhaustive hearings were held by the Foreign Affairs Committee. Some members of the committee wished to improve the bill by rewriting it and amending it. That occurred, and finally the bill passed the House perhaps a year after the hearings, but too late for consideration by the Senate last year. That is the trouble now. That enabled the Appropriations Committee, very properly I think, to decline to appropriate funds for this program, because there was no authorization of law for it, it having been done heretofore under the President's war powers, I believe. We do not criticize the Appropriations Committee. They were probably right. We just hope they will continue that same policy in other bills. Practically the same bill as passed the House was reintroduced. Exhaustive hearings occurred again. The committee has amended the bill considerably, and improved it. Now, time is of the essence, because if this bill does not become law by the end of this month, the cultural relations program will necessarily discontinue for lack of funds. As has been said, the wave lengths of the Voice of America will have to be abandoned, and some other country, so many of whom are anxious for those wave lengths, will greedily grab them up. The rooms and buildings in other countries which we now have rented for libraries and for the school program will have to be abandoned, and others will rent them. Finally, the broadcasting material, very expensive material, will have to be sold or junked or abandoned.

The personnel of the department will disband and be scattered to the four winds. Of course, there are Members of this House, charming gentlemen that they are, who will contend that it would be an improvement for the personnel to disband. But no member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, no Member of the House who is thoroughly familiar with that situation, will agree with them. On the other hand, I thoroughly agree with my distinguished colleagues, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RICHARDS] and the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], in their opinion that while mistakes have naturally occurred—mistakes always occur in any such large organization as that; you and I make mistakes; I make them, and I am afraid some of you do sometimes—while mistakes have occurred, I am strongly of the opinion, in fact, I am absolutely convinced, that on the whole a great job for this country has been done under the able direction of Assistant Secretary Benton, in which I wish to congratulate him.

Mr. RIZLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JARMAN. I yield.

Mr. RIZLEY. I wish the gentleman would turn to page 9, section 404 of the bill, and tell me what that means.

Mr. JARMAN. Why, the gentleman can read the English language as well as I can. Of course the gentleman knows what that means. The gentleman ought not to ask me that. He understands that.

Mr. RIZLEY. Does that mean that this Government is going to take anyone they want to put on this program, whether a foreign citizen or not, and pay his expense of training in any college or public or private institution in this country?

Mr. JARMAN. I do not think it means that, but I will yield to the author of the bill, who can probably explain it better than I can.

Mr. MUNDT. It does not mean that at all. It provides for an exchange of students. The students pay their own expense. The State Department can reimburse the Government. That is handled specifically under terms of procedure now well-outlined and in operation.

Mr. RIZLEY. Regardless of what the gentleman says, I was not facetious at all. The last part says to provide for training for somebody making a request upon the Secretary. He makes his request to some Government agency to provide for such training from State and local agencies or private institutions and organizations, and that would be the responsibility of the Federal Government.

Mr. MUNDT. The gentleman is taking a few words out of the context. If he will read the whole paragraph he will understand the meaning.

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a consent request?

Mr. JARMAN. I yield.

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD immediately following the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JARMAN. I yield for a question; but then I must decline to yield further.

Mr. McDONOUGH. I wish to ask the gentleman, a member of the committee, if the committee during its study of the bill gave consideration to the effect the bill would have upon the increase of immigration of this country if we advertise the virtues of the United States as thoroughly as the bill proposes.

Mr. JARMAN. My recollection is that no particular consideration was given by the committee to that question.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Does not the gentleman believe it will have that effect by increasing desires on the part of millions of people in Europe and other parts of the world to come to the United States?

Mr. JARMAN. It will undoubtedly have that effect.

Mr. McDONOUGH. And will that not result in inclination to pass legislation to meet that situation?

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JARMAN. I gladly yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JUDD. This cannot possibly change our immigration laws as a result of these programs going abroad; there is good reason to believe people in those countries will seek with increased determination to correct their own societies and rebuild them along the pattern of freedom they see in America.

Mr. JARMAN. And we have such confidence in this country that we do not fear those who may come here because of this advertising.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I must decline to yield further.

Mr. Chairman, this program is based almost entirely on the conviction that mutual understanding between the peoples of the world will serve as a firm foundation for lasting peace and that by contributing to peace it will save the taxpayers of this country a thousand, yes, I will say a millionfold of its cost.

The program contains many things which have been long-standing functions of the State Department and which have been in progress through general authority given that Department. I refer particularly to the radio news bulletin which goes to our embassies throughout the world daily, I believe, and which I so thoroughly enjoyed and by which I kept in contact with the United States in South America 3 years ago before this Division of the State Department came into being. The library program is some 12 or 15 years old. While it was possible for those programs to be carried forward by the State Department under general authority then, now that they have been brought into this Cultural Relations Division and the Congress has declined to provide funds for it, it would—I am not a lawyer—but I am afraid it would be impossible for the State Department to carry those very necessary and worthwhile functions on in the future because of the declination of the Congress to provide funds therefor.

Mr. Chairman, unless one with a contrary view appeared during the one day when I was unavoidably detained, every single witness who appeared before our committee was vigorously in favor of this legislation. They were such distinguished gentlemen as Secretary of State Marshall; Under Secretary Dean Acheson; General Eisenhower; General Bedell Smith, who was General Eisenhower's chief of staff during the war and is now our Ambassador to Russia; and Secretary of Commerce Harriman, a former Ambassador to Russia and England. Not only did all of these gentlemen vigorously urge the adoption of this legislation, but no opposing witness appeared, despite the invitation I heard extended by our able chairman through the press to anyone in the United States who wished to appear against this legislation and the assurance given by him that he would be happy to have them. Unless they appeared on that one day I was absent, no single witness appeared against the proposal.

You tell me that a program, the criticism of which has been so widely publicized as has this, particularly during the last few months, throughout the United States, you tell me that after an invitation like that, when a committee has heard testimony for many days, there would not be witnesses in opposition?

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JARMAN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JACKSON of California. May I say that on that one day there were no witnesses in opposition to this bill.

Mr. JARMAN. I thank the gentleman. I thought that was true but I wanted to be sure. You tell me that under those conditions, when no one appears, not a single person appears against the bill, that the program is all wrong? If so, I would like for you to explain to this House why that is true and why the people of the United States generally are incompetent to ascertain that fact.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JARMAN. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. I think the gentleman may well add a list of the distinguished witnesses that appeared in support of the bill in addition to the fact that none appeared against it. There were such great organizations as the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Amvets, and others, all offering testimony in the hearings strongly endorsing this legislation. Certainly everyone is not wrong except those opposing it on the floor of the House.

Mr. JARMAN. I thank the gentleman with whom I thoroughly agree. I am impressed that the main trouble, Mr. Chairman, is probably the fact that the critics of this program are disturbed because it does not embellish the situation in our country. They apparently feel that it should be made to appear more attractive than it really is; whereas we are willing for the people of other countries to see and hear it "as is." I do not indulge in the insinuation that we who favor this legislation entertain more respect for and confidence in our country than those who oppose it, but we wish this program to continue to neither embellish nor belittle it. We wish it to be a proportionate cross section of our country as it is.

Relative to the circus-lady picture, for instance, which has been so generally criticized, I call your attention to the fact that we do have circus ladies in this country who somewhat resemble this picture. While by no means an artist, I also refer to the fact that General Eisenhower considers this phase of the program very valuable. Now with reference to the broadcast about Senator TAFT and Mr. Wallace, I do not believe that one who has read them and is thoroughly familiar with the conditions under which they were rendered could possibly criticize either. The whole Taft broadcast was entirely in order and not the least bit uncomplimentary to this gentleman. The Wallace broadcast went only to Germany and was not very complimentary to the Wallace family as statesmen, but highly so as raisers of corn.

I am afraid the trouble with the Voice of America in the eyes of its critics is the fact that in the words of General Marshall, "Its broadcasts do not gild, but cover the earth with truth." It is the purpose of the entire program to send not only to Russia, but throughout the world, a true cross section of what happens in these United States of ours. The fact that this seems to be so generally realized in other countries enabled either General Marshall or General Eisenhower to says, "The people of the world believe our broadcasts."

We wish to continue to deserve this reputation and cannot do so if we color or slant the information we send them.

Mr. Chairman, it is the purpose of the State Department to continue to conduct this program in such a way that the people of the world will continue to believe these broadcasts. Despite the criticism of those who think a different picture than that which really exists should be painted to the people of other countries, the State Department is not going to yield to that insistence and spread false propaganda, even though these critics believe such would benefit the United States. We members of the Foreign Affairs Committee thoroughly agree with and approve this determination.

I was surprised to hear General Eisenhower say that even during the war it was the best policy to spread the truth. I was dumfounded when he replied in the negative to my inquiry if it was not necessary to use a lot of falsehoods during the actual critical phases of the battles. Although stating that falsehoods were sometimes used at critical periods, he insisted that the truth generally paid even during war. He gave as an illustration when we took the island of Pantelleria. That was his first hop from North Africa. He said substantially: "I would not agree that broadcasts should go to that island to the effect that we were going to bomb it, that we were going to attack it and destroy those there if they did not surrender until we were actually ready to do it, because I was afraid if I did that and did not follow through we would not get the results which you will recall we did get when the attack actually occurred."

I need not call your attention to the fact that Pantelleria was one of our easiest operations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Chairman, America not only financed but won two wars for the world. America fed the world after both of these wars. America has given and is still giving as well as lending untold millions to help feed and rehabilitate the rest of the world.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the rest of the world is so stupid as not to know the ideals and objectives of America, then it is just too stupid to ever understand our ideals regardless of any type of program which the State Department may institute.

Mr. Chairman, I have a constituent in Ross County, Ohio, who not only founded but who was the director of the American Library in Paris in 1918, where he served in that capacity for 7 years. He tells me that any attempt to change the ideas of Europeans about the United States is worse than futile. He also tells me that his experience convinces and proves to him that it is not only stupid but absolutely wrong to attempt to tell Europeans what to think. Mr. Speaker, this constituent, speaking with authority, implores me to use my best efforts to prevent any more American dollars being wasted on such stupidity.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN (after counting). One hundred and two Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Chairman, as a new Member of this body I have felt for some time that one of the greatest dilemmas with which we have been faced has been our desire to legislate so as to eliminate administrative weaknesses. It is a very difficult thing to do. The executive department has grown tremendously during the past few years, and in this time has developed certain tendencies which fill many of us with trepidation. I believe that the great majority of the Members of this House are for some type of program, and I believe that their worry comes chiefly from the question which has arisen concerning the quality of the personnel. I believe also that a great part of that worry has been justified.

I think one thing should be made very clear, and that is that this is not the OWI. The OIC has inherited certain people from the OWI, but upwards of 11,000 people were employed at home and overseas at the peak of the Government's international information and cultural activities in wartime. In November 1946 the OIC total had been reduced to 3,140 and the present total is about 2,800. I am informed that new people from outside sources were aggressively sought and placed in key positions, and that only the best of those in the transferred agencies were retained.

The merger in the State Department, the drastic reduction in personnel and the adaptation of these activities to peacetime rather than wartime requirements was a gigantic job. It was accomplished in a few months and without any break in the continuity of the Government's overseas information program.

The OIC has come under criticism for the alleged inefficiency of some of its operations and, as I say, there has been criticism of its personnel. With respect to the first point, almost all OIC operations have recently evidenced improvement in terms of the response of foreign audiences, due, in the main, to improvements in operations growing out of experience. As an illustration may be cited the fact that the number of letters received by the Voice of America has increased steadily from an average of about 5,000 to an average of 25,000 a month. The number of people seeing OIC motion pictures abroad has increased until the total is now approximately 10,000,000 a month. Last year, 3,000,000 people used OIC libraries abroad. The number of foreign students assisted has increased sharply, and the placement of articles in the foreign press has also increased.

The interest manifested indicates the growing effectiveness of the OIC measured by the yardstick of the response of foreign peoples.

I might say here that the reports from Italy, from members of the United States press over there, are that the Italian people are very much disturbed at the prospect that there may be a discontinuance of these broadcasts and other services. They have come to rely on these programs in many ways; and particularly from the point of view of the exchange of technical information with respect to hygiene and other matters, they have come to regard these programs as very valuable. It seems to me that just now, with the Italian treaty ratified, with Yugoslav troops poised on the Italian border, with the threat of riots, with De Gasperi trying to form a cabinet which will exclude the Communists, this is a poor time indeed for us to say, "We will be silent. We will continue to do good by providing you with relief but we will be silent. We will, in the words of Mr. Churchill, do good by stealth."

Since assuming responsibility for OIC nearly 2 years ago, Mr. Benton has been keenly aware of the importance of personnel and he has been constantly seeking to improve the standards of personnel and to bring new and competent people into the organization. I heard the other day, for instance, that an old friend of mine, Stewart Brown, who used to be with the U. P. in Rome, is now the deputy director. Another good man is my old friend John Begg, who is assistant director for media. And there are others. Notwithstanding the uncertainties as to the OIC budget and the problems of integrating the personnel into the Department of Foreign Service, 124 new professional people have been brought into the OIC from the outside since July 1, 1946. Thirty-five of these have been placed in top supervisory positions.

As a further illustration of the policy of strengthening top-level personnel, it is interesting to note that 9 out of the 10 division chiefs of OIC have been changed since January 1, 1946. The total overseas personnel numbers approximately 1,800, of whom about 325 are Americans. Each information staff abroad functions as an integral part of the foreign mission. The reason there are so many aliens is for the same reason that you have them in the Foreign Service, where I believe about 60 percent of the overseas personnel are aliens. Aliens are cheaper and in certain jobs more useful. As far as the domestic personnel is concerned, I would call your attention to the fact that a year ago the OIC employed approximately 290 alien employees, and that within the past year the number has been reduced to 14, a reduction of some 95 percent.

I think those figures are convincing and encouraging and I could go on and tell you something about the individuals, mentioning names and citing records. But there is no time. It is more vital that I point out to you that there is intellectual starvation in Europe today, particularly in central and eastern Europe. When the war was over there was an almost Messianic hope that America was going to come in with the implements of peace as she came along with the implements of war. When I say "implements of peace" I do not just mean relief; I mean intellectual stimulation and comfort. Do not forget that particularly in central and eastern Europe for years before the war all that these people were fed in the way of intellectual nourishment was what the Nazi propagandists fed them. There is an intellectual aridity in that part of Europe which is the result of this historic fact. There is a moral crisis in Europe and there is an intellectual crisis, too. This crisis is underlined and accentuated by an ethical nihilism which is creeping in all over Europe and which threatens to become more widespread and more barbaric even than nazism. If we do not do something about it nobody will. If we do not assume intellectual leadership, how can we assume political leadership? This is a war for men's minds. We shall be silent at our peril. During the war there was a poem which was revived from time to time as Americans went off to battle:

> Though reason chafe and love repine,
> There came a voice without reply,
> It's man's perdition to be safe
> When for the truth he ought to die.

It is important that we in America live according to these truths, but it is also vital that we should declare these truths and identify them and explain them to those who for all these years have been fed predigested pabulum by the totalitarian states. If we do not, we can have no hope of winning them over to our system of government. Democracy must be an article of export if we are to make it survive and spread and serve as a sword and a shield in defense of our system. We 140,000,000 Americans are the happy few who now have the salvation of western civilization in our hands.

If we do not pass this legislation it will be one more indication that we are fundamentally and intellectually isolationists. The people of the world will not believe what we tell them after that. They will not understand all the minor domestic implications of this thing. They will observe that here in America we have decided that we have nothing to say to them. In a world of rapid communications and vehement proclamations we prefer to remain silent. I believe that it is vital that we approve this measure. I have been assured that the personnel will be further improved as it has been improved in the past.

Mr. Chairman, I think that we must urgently shed light where now there is darkness. I believe that we in America, with our idea of liberty which is still the great revolutionary concept of the day, must be articulate in our attempts to throw back the reactionary forces of darkness and despair and despotism which in spite of the war's end still are very much on the march.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and one Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I believe there are two fundamental problems before us. The first is: Do we want an informational program at all? If that is answered in the negative, then nothing else matters. The second problem is: What kind of program do we want?

With respect to the first problem as to whether or not we want an informational program, my answer would be "Yes."

It was only a few days ago that we observed Memorial Day, and I expect from 10,000 rostrums we spoke of freedom and of a new birth of freedom. That is why hundreds of thousands of young Americans died. And the question is: Do we stop there or do we go on with the crusade? Now, the great obstacle to meeting the yearning of freedom everywhere in the world is falsehood. That is the thing we are contending with in an informational program.

For quite some time now I have been noting some of the falsehoods that go out over the radio, which have appeared in Pravda and which have appeared in Izvestia and some of the other organs of communication. I want to read to you a few of them because they are authentic. They said or wrote in some of these media: "It was the Russians who crushed the Nazis."

You see, we had nothing to do with it. They make it appear that we were not a part of World War II, made no contribution to victory, lost no young men on the field of battle. Millions will believe it if that goes uncontroverted.

There was a motion picture in Prague called Victory Over Asia. A colonel of the United States Army tried to gain access. He had great difficulty. They showed that the victory over the Japanese was won by Soviet troops and there was not an American soldier in evidence anywhere. In that motion picture, which was made by the Soviet Union, they showed the surrender in Tokyo Bay, and there was not an American officer or admiral present. That is the thing that goes on today. Shall it go uncontroverted?

In Pravda they said, "Only Soviet Union has modern equipment." They said nothing about the $11,000,000,000 of equipment that we lavished upon them. They never mentioned the casualties of the American Army and Navy in the Russian journals. They only had the casualties of Russia.

They stated in Pravda that in the United States there are one and one-half million jobless veterans.

You see, the purpose is to break down confidence on the part of the people, in the integrity and in the greatness of the American system.

In Pravda they said, "Veterans are faced with poverty and hunger, and receive no care from the United States."

In Pravda they said, "There are 350,000 United States soldiers who cannot read and write their own name." They seek to convey the impression that this is an illiterate country.

In Russian journals they said, "Nothing can stop inflation in the United States."

In these same journals they said, "A fierce struggle is going on in the United States."

In those same journals and over radio Moscow they have said, "Only the Soviet delegation at United Nations fights for peace."

You see, we are the enemies of mankind. They seek to establish that we are imperialists. This is going out over the radio. I heard Moscow radio when I was in Turkey and Greece, and I had the transcriptions translated so that I could understand what was being said.

They have said in Izvestia, "World Bank was designed to ensnare small countries."

They said in these Russian journals, "American imperialism has come to kindle civil war in Iran."

They said, "Americans are trying to transform China into a military base."

They said, "The United States interferes in democratic regimes in Poland, Rumania, and Yugoslavia."

A few months ago they said, "We are interested in the bases in Greenland, because they are intended to bomb vital centers of Europe."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has expired.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for two additional minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There are two other items that you should hear. Here is what they said over the radio in Korea: "American soldiers are murdering workers in south Korea."

That is below the thirty-eighth parallel. That is what we occupy. Then they said, "United States troops blowing cholera germs across the border to kill people in north Korea."

What chance has freedom in the world unless the one great exemplar and exponent of freedom in the world can roll back that whole wave of falsehood, can roll back that slow stain that is designed for miserable, impoverished, and hungry people who, like entombed miners, hear the tap-tap of a rescue party, believing there is still a chance? But when this kind of falsehood goes out to 150,000,000 people outside of Russia and persuades them finally that we are the enemies of mankind, then what happens to every effort that we make, consonant with and pursuant to the sacrifices that were made in World War II, to meet and to still the yearning for freedom that is so strong in human hearts in every part of the earth?

I do not know how much it will cost. Maybe ten million will be enough, maybe fifteen million; but in any event we cannot let this kind of falsehood go on without challenge, because it simply undermines the efficacy of everything that the United States seeks to contrive in this world. I saw an example of visual propaganda in Guatemala when I was there. I was talking with our Minister in 1940. I saw how clever these propagandists were. They took the story of the Battle of the Little Big Horn, in which the braves of Sitting Bull had annihilated the forces of Custer, and simply perverted American history and made it appear that Custer's forces had annihilated Sitting Bull and all his braves. Show that to mestizos with some Indian blood and they get the wrong impression about the United States unless it is undone.

In an integrated world where the burden of peace is upon our shoulders, is it not important that we present our message to the world and enhance the hope of a peace that has a chance to endure?

It was not until World War II that we became fully aware of the importance of psychology as an aid to victory. The very fact that we established an Office of War Information to advise people in foreign countries of our objectives and purposes and the added fact that within the Military Establishment itself there was created a Psychological Warfare Branch is the best evidence of the importance of information in the pursuit of victory.

The victory has been won and the problem now is to win the real victory of peace. Who will deny as he appraises the feverish condition of the world today and who knows the difficulties and obstacles to peace and the purposes of victory that it becomes necessary to carry that purpose to every corner of the earth. Other nations are spending untold sums to popularize their viewpoint and their ideology and it is difficult to appreciate the viewpoint of those who would at this stage of the peace negotiations revert to a kind of psychological isolation. If that should be the policy of the Congress and the country then we should recognize at once that in the days ahead it will be America against the world because their efforts in the field of propaganda, information, and publicity will not cease.

The case seems all too clear for a continuation of an informational program and that brings us to the second problem, namely, what type of a program.

At the very outset of my remarks I stated that the proposition before us embraces two problems. The first is whether or not we shall continue an informational program, and the second what kind of a program shall it be.

With respect to this second problem, I share the dissatisfaction of many Members of the Congress with regard to the type and efficacy of the programs that have heretofore been carried on.

Like you, I want to be certain that it will present America in a proper light. I want to be certain that it will represent the spirit, the achievements, and the greatness of this country.

The ministries of propaganda in totalitarian countries are only too glad to obtain, if possible, that kind of literature and that type of motion pictures which presents certain seamy aspects of American life in order to persuade their own people that this country is filled with dissension, racial antipathies, a faltering faith in our own system, and other sentiments which are designed to put us in a bad light.

If such countries could contrive it, they would not care to present to their people historical films which show the growth and evolution of America but instead present such bawdy presentations as Tobacco Road and the Grapes of Wrath, which overemphasize and magnify a facet of American life which is the exception rather than the rule. These ministries of propaganda would be interested in such books and publications as are captious and critical of our own form of government. They would be interested in radio programs which reflect upon the purposes and objectives of the United States.

All this bears out the importance of placing this program in competent hands who will make certain that the real story of America and the American tradition will be told.

To that end I propose at the appropriate time to offer an amendment which would create an Advisory Commission with power to formulate the policy that would be expressed under the authority in this measure. I am setting out here the full text of the amendment:

Amendment to H. R. 3342: Page 18, after line 5, insert the following title, and change the title numbers, section numbers, and cross references in other titles of the bill accordingly:

"TITLE IX—ADVISORY COMMISSION TO FORMULATE POLICIES

"FORMULATION OF POLICIES

"SEC. 601. There is hereby created a United States Information and Educational Exchange Advisory Commission (hereinafter in this title referred to as the Commission) to be constituted as provided in section 602. The Commission shall formulate and present to the Secretary of State the policies to be followed and adhered to in connection with the interchange of persons, knowledge and skills, the assignment of specialists, the preparation and dissemination of information about the United States, its people and its policies, and the carrying out of the other provisions of this act.

"MEMBERSHIP OF THE COMMISSION; GENERAL PROVISIONS

"SEC. 602. (a) The Commission shall consist of 10 members, not more than six of whom shall be from any one political party, as follows: (1) Nine members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and (2) the Secretary of State or such officer in the State Department as may be designated by such Secretary.

"(b) The members of the Commission shall represent the public interest, but of the persons appointed under clause (1) of subsection (a) of this section, one shall be selected from among educators, one from among individuals formerly in active service in the armed forces of the United States, one from representatives of labor, one from the newspaper business, one from the motion picture industry, one from the radio industry, and three from persons having general business experience. All persons so appointed shall be persons of national reputations in their respective fields. No person holding any compensated Federal or State office shall be eligible for appointment under clause (1) of subsection (a) of this section.

"(c) The term of each member appointed under clause (1) of subsection (a) of this section shall be 3 years except that the terms of office of such members first taking office on the Commission shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of appointment, three at the end of 1 year, three at the end of 2 years and three at the end of 3 years from the date of the enactment of this act. Any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor is appointed shall be appointed for the remainder of such term. Upon the expiration of his term of office any member may continue to serve until his successor is appointed and has qualified.

"(d) The President shall designate a chairman and a vice chairman from among members of the Commission.

"(e) The members of the Commission shall receive no compensation for their services as such members but shall be entitled to reimbursement for travel and subsistence in connection with attendance of meetings of the Commission away from their places of residences.

"(f) The Commission is authorized to adopt such rules and regulations as it may deem necessary to carry out the authority conferred upon it by this title.

"(g) The Commission is authorized, without regard to the civil service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to appoint and fix the compensation of such clerical assistants as may be necessary in carrying out the provisions of this title.

"RECOMMENDATIONS AND REPORTS

"SEC. 603. The Commission shall from time to time prepare and transmit to the Secretary and to the Congress its recommendations for carrying out the various activities authorized by this act, and shall submit to the Congress a quarterly report of all programs and activities recommended by it under this act and the action taken to carry out such recommendations."

Mr. Chairman, you will observe that an advisory committee of 10 with established reputations is provided for and that the members of such a commission would be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Under such a provision if a person with oblique views should find a place on this commission, the responsibility would then be chargeable to the legislative branch. The amendment specifies the background of the members of the commission so that they will bring to their responsibilities experience in every field of communications. They would not be compensated and the amendment requires that from time to time they must transmit to the Congress their recommendations for carrying out the provisions of this act.

I am confident that with this type of a commission there will be a clear and distinct check upon the types of programs to be carried out, and there is complete reason to believe that the real America would be represented to the people abroad as an answer to the untruths and falsehoods which are constantly being disseminated to millions of people concerning conditions at home and the objectives we have in mind in bringing peace and freedom to the hundreds of millions who live in misery today and still nurture a slender hope for liberty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GATHINGS].

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to pay tribute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT], who only a few days ago made such a wonderful appeal for the continuation of the Voice of America program. Mr. Short's speech was sufficient in itself to have assured the necessary appropriations to continue this vital service to the nations of the world. I commend the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House for bringing this legislation to the floor, authorizing these broadcasts through the legislative processes.

America has assumed a most prominent place among the nations of the world. With such a distinction there goes with it responsibilities which we should not look lightly upon. For more than 150 years America has gone forward under the principles enunciated by our founding fathers, "rule of the people." It is all the more appropriate that this bill emanated from the House of Representatives. A man cannot sit here as a Member of this body without being elected by the people of the district he serves. Each of us in this body has the distinction which no other public official in the United States could boast. It is the only job to which a person could never take office by appointment.

Now, this program is designed to convey to the radio audiences of the world, among other things, information about our representative form of government, freedom of speech, freedom of press, and freedom of religion. If the trend toward communism is halted, a large measure of credit would rightfully go to these informational American broadcasts.

I believe in economy in the operation of the Government. I do not, however, favor eliminating necessary and needed functions in order to get it. The Voice of America was established on January 6, 1946, by the State Department for the purpose of letting the world know what America is thinking and doing.

These broadcasts are on a 24-hour schedule, beaming programs in 24 different languages to all corners of the world. We do not know what the exact figures are on the listening audience, but they are far greater than most people think. More than 50,000 letters were received by this organization in 1946 relative to this program. Sixty-five percent of these letters were received from Europe, 25 percent from Latin-America, and the remaining 10 percent came from the Far East. Statistics reveal that a conservative estimate of listeners runs more than 100,000,000. This is very indicative of a large world audience.

On this daily schedule of broadcasting, the world hears quite a variety of programs. Thirty-six transmitters are kept in constant operation sending out over 5,000 programs a month. The breakdown of programs shows that of all programs included, 17 percent is devoted to news, 34 percent on developments in all fields of American life, 3 percent on drama, 28 percent to music, and 18 percent in variety, such as radio shows which are familiar to us.

It is very evident that these peoples want and need these programs. They hear them, that we are certain. In a recent letter to the Assistant Secretary of State William Benton, the Honorable Hans Olav, who is the counselor to the Norwegian Embassy, had this to say, and I quote:

> I have just returned from a 3 months' visit to Norway during which I talked with and met many people. In literally every place I visited, I found that those who had short-wave sets were keenly interested in the American programs and told me rather proudly that they were able to pick up the United States. They were grateful not only that good music was heard, but also for the occasional educational and other talks carried on the short-wave programs. It seems to me that this living link of the spoken word and musical note between the United States and Norway is of inestimable value to the betterment of understanding between our two peoples.

We know that there are relatively few radio sets abroad in comparison with the number in America. Nearly all foreign sets are equipped with short-wave receivers and the Department's personnel in these countries inform us that people will come from miles to hear the programs of the Voice of America.

It is entirely above all barriers of language, literacy, national boundaries, and censorship. When the former Secretary of State, James Byrnes, made his famous speech at Stuttgart, Germany, last year, the Polish censors refused to tell the people about it. They allowed nothing to be printed and kept everything contained in this speech secret from the Polish people. It was rebroadcast by the Voice of America and soon the Polish censors released all the details because the people had heard it anyway over their short-wave sets.

Letters and reports from the four corners of the earth clearly demonstrate to the State Department that the people are very much interested in what goes on here in America. The British Broadcasting Corp. is spending $20,000,000 annually in putting 98 program-hours a day in short wave to foreign nations. The 1947 appropriation to carry on these broadcasts amounted to the sum of $7,804,321, which is not excessive for the great benefits derived.

The State Department has as its target, broadcasts beamed to every country of the world in which there is a radio set. Requests are coming from everywhere to increase the period of time allotted each country. The Balkans want more. Southeast Asia wants more. The whole world wants more.

Let us keep on telling the world about our progress. The nations of the world should be privileged to continue to hear this program. The Voice of America should be expanded, not hamstrung.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER].

THE PIECES OF THE TRUMAN PROGRAM

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I have no word of criticism of Mr. Benton. I am sure he is a very estimable gentleman, and, of course, I yield to no one in my respect for the members of the Foreign Relations Committee and its very able chairman and the chairman of the subcommittee.

Any realistic appraisal of the world situation today makes it obvious that spending money to propagandize our way of life through such devices as the Voice of America is a flagrant waste of taxpayers' funds. The picture of tons of potatoes being deliberately destroyed by our Department of Agriculture did more damage to American prestige abroad than a hundred radio broadcasts can ever repair. Within the past 2 weeks it has been revealed that we have 1,031 employees in the State Department Office of Information and Cultural Affairs in the domestic branch alone. There are hundreds more overseas. We know that their objectives are praiseworthy. They are out to win friends for the American way of life as opposed to socialism and communism. But we shall not win converts to our economic system unless we demonstrate at home that we can solve our problems more effectively under liberty than they are solved overseas under totalitarian regimentation—on the British Socialist model or the Russian Communist pattern. I urge Congress to use the money we should be wasting in this way to give American taxpayers some indication that we have not forgotten them. Just as Americans would deeply resent any widespread effort by British Socialists or Russian Communists to propagandize us, so do Europeans resent this propaganda technique on our part.

The Voice of America broadcasts are just one piece of the Truman program.

The pieces are beginning to fall into place, and the pattern is becoming clear. It is not a pretty pattern; it is not a pattern which the people of the United States can look on with confidence or with a sense of hope for the future.

Taken alone, something could be said for the avowed purposes of the program embodied in H. R. 3342—the promotion of the interchange of persons, knowledge, and skills between the people of the United States and other countries, and public dissemination abroad of information about the United States, its people, and its policies. That sounds like a laudable purpose, and, in fact, such interchange has been going on for generations.

But we have learned to look behind the titles and the labels of measures proposed by the Truman administration.

The Greek-Turkey-aid bill was presented to this Congress as a humanitarian measure, designed to relieve hunger and suffering. The Truman administration attempted to conceal and disguise its true character, which was admitted only after the measure was subjected to searching examination on the floor of the House. Then it was admitted that all of the so-called aid to Turkey was to be military aid, and most of the aid to Greece was to be military aid. The humanitarian purpose turned out to be hypocrisy.

No, Mr. Chairman, we must look behind the high-sounding title in the present bill about the interchange of knowledge and seek out the true character of this measure. Its true character is not difficult to discover. The Voice of America program is nothing more or less than the propaganda arm of the Truman doctrine. It is just one more piece in the pattern of the Truman adventure in international relations.

What are some of the other pieces in the Truman program which have become apparent in the past few days?

On May 26, Mr. Truman urged the Congress to authorize a program of military collaboration with all the petty and not so petty dictators of South America. Mr. Truman submited a draft of a bill which would authorize the United States to take over the arming of South America on a scale far beyond that involved in the $400,000,000 hand-out to Greece and Turkey.

Under the Truman proposal the United States would train the soldiers, sailors, and airmen of the other nations of the Western Hemisphere. We would maintain, repair, and replace the military equipment of those nations. We would transfer American arms, planes, ships, and other military items and munitions, together with technical information, and we would accept in payment for such activity anything which would be satisfactory to the President. This is the most far-reaching proposal for the militarization of this hemisphere at American expense of which it is possible to conceive. It means the pouring out of the resources of the United States in support of the Fascist gang around dictator Perón in Argentina. It means the pouring out of the resources of the United States behind every ambitious dictator-on-the-make in South America. It means turning South America into an armed camp. But this is only one piece of the emerging Truman pattern.

On June 2, Mr. Truman continued his campaign for universal peacetime military training in the United States by releasing the Truman commission's recommendations. Even Mr. Truman's commission did not attempt to estimate the staggering cost of this adventure into militarism at home, but it estimated that the outlay of $1,750,000,000 a year was only a part of the total.

Let me repeat, this Truman commission itself admits that an annual cost of $1,750,000,000—more than four and one-half million a day from now on—would be only a part of the cost in dollars of this proposal to fasten a permanent military system upon the United States. But even the cost in dollars is not as important as the cost in American liberty. Every instinct of the American people rebels at the proposal that the military should take over in America. They know that where military control begins, there the basic American liberties end.

But military control at home is a part of the emerging Truman program. The Truman administration is using all its propaganda resources in an attempt to soften up the American people to accept this idea. On Wednesday of this week the New York Times carried the headline "Patterson backs 'military mind'." Mr. Truman's Secretary of War was at Columbia University outlining the charms of the military mind, and according to the New York Times news story, and I quote:

> Mr. Patterson was joined in his defense of the "military mind" by Secretary of the Navy James Forrestal who cited wartime incidents to give point to his argument.

Yes; the Truman administration is busy in its attempt to sell the idea of military control to the people of America. And hand in hand with this propaganda campaign go secret meetings for industrial mobilization.

On June 4, a widely read Washington columnist reported, and I quote:

> One of the most secret meetings since war days was held behind tightly barred doors in Washington's vast Pentagon building last week.

The writer is Mr. Pearson, and no one has attempted to refute his report. He went on, and I quote:

> Plans were laid in detail for the establishment of an industry reserve corps of American workers and employers in major American industries.
> Purpose of the reserve corps would be to prepare industry for rapid conversion to wartime production in an emergency. Special training courses for employers and employees will be worked out if the plan finally is approved. The industrial corps would have units in every major manufacturing plant in the Nation.

This is the kind of thing which is taking place behind barred doors in the Pentagon Building, about which the people of the United States learn only by accident. This is a part of the emerging Truman program.

It is against this background that the Voice of America program must be considered. This vast foreign propaganda machine proposed by the administration is a part of this program. It is a part just as Mr. Truman's friendship with the dictator Perón in South America is a part. It is a part just as Mr. Truman's eagerness for universal military training in the United States is a part. It is a part just as Mr. Truman's proposal for arming every South American country to the teeth is a part. It is a part of the whole Truman doctrine of draining off the resources of the United States to support every reactionary government in the world.

I am opposed to the Voice of America just as I am opposed to every part of the dangerous and irresponsible Truman doctrine.

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY].

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, finally we know just where our colleague stands on this legislation. I suppose we may even assume that he is against all foreign missions.

Mr. Chairman, as I have listened to this debate and have tried to summarize the objections to the pending bill, I have concluded that the greatest objection is that the program may not be properly administered in the interest of America. This is tantamount to saying that America does not have enough patriotic men and women to whom this program might be entrusted. It seems to me that this is a rather fatal admission for a gentleman to make and, in fact, an absurd position for gentlemen to take.

While listening to the debate I asked myself the question "Is democracy on retreat in the world?" We have just witnessed within the last few hours the trojan horse technique of Russian aggression, and we know that from VE-day on the world has witnessed a bloodless conquest of communism. Communism has been spreading like a prairie fire. All of us know that false Russian propaganda has played an important part in the spread of communism.

I visited Europe immediately following VE-day, and I had an opportunity somewhat similar to that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] to hear some of the Russian broadcasts, the only answer to which we can make is to give even more strength to the Voice of America, to the end that we might be able to penetrate the iron curtain of Soviet influence. Immediately after victory in Europe and as soon as the Russians reached Berlin, they started to spread false propaganda. Ten days or 2 weeks after VE-day I was at Magdeburg, Germany, on the banks of the Elbe River. I stood at one end of Friendship

Bridge, which was built by American men and with American money, and guarded at the other end by Russian soldiers. This was the bridge which was used to transfer the displaced persons from one zone to another. Immediately after VE-day—Russia did not wait 24 days or 24 months, but perhaps within 24 hours—a picture of Joe Stalin was placed on a large road sign at the Russian end of Friendship Bridge welcoming the displaced persons back into the Russian occupied part of Germany. The minds of these displaced persons were being poisoned by false propaganda which came from the Russian-controlled radio in Berlin.

Since VJ-day I have traveled in the islands of the Pacific. I was recently in Greece and Turkey. All over the world Russian propaganga is villifying American democracy and defaming our institutions in the eyes of the people of the world. We cannot say that this propaganda is not having influence. We know that it is having influence. We see definite evidence daily of the spread of communism as it sweeps across the earth.

To abandon this program now would mean that all that has been spent on it in the past and all the good that has been accomplished so far would be a total and complete loss. It would be even worse than a total and complete loss, because the Russians would say to the rest of the world that the great truths which have been heard over American radio were nothing more than false propaganda and that even the American people realized the falsity of the statements which had been made by the Voice of America over the airways of the world and had repudiated the program.

Mr. CHELF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CHELF. Is it not true that when some 5,000 tons of wheat was given out by the Russians in the French zone here a few months ago there was great fanfare but no mention made whatever when some 2,000,000 tons were given to those same unfortunate people in France by the United States?

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman is correct. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important matter. The objections offered to the passage of this bill should not appeal to the intelligence of the Members of this House.

Someone, a moment ago, referred to some statement which was attributed to the Saviour. We all know that the Saviour once said: "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." We must free the minds of the people of the world by letting them know the truth about the institutions of America. We have liberated the bodies of the oppressed people of the universe. We must not now permit their minds to be enslaved.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, I think the question before us can be summed up in this fashion. We fought the war not with money alone, we fought it with money, with men, and with ideas. We are now asked by the opponents of this bill to win the peace with money alone. This we cannot do unless we want to tie one hand behind our backs. We can win the peace only with men and with ideas as well as money.

Let us see what arguments the gentlemen who oppose this bill have to muster against it and how they square those arguments with the arguments they themselves have made in the past.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I will yield as soon as I have finished my statement.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman referred to those who made arguments against it. We have not had any opportunity to make any argument.

Mr. JAVITS. It has been argued before on many occasions by those who now oppose this bill, and at great length, that appropriations which were made for relief and other purposes to aid in the reconstruction of Europe that they did the United States no good, because nobody knew that they came from the United States, and that such assistance represented the humanitarian and statesmanlike act of the United States. Here is a bill which proposes to make us to make clear to the world just what we are doing and why we are doing it. Nevertheless it is opposed. May I point out that the cost involved in this whole program is at most three-tenths of 1 percent of our program of reconstruction since VJ-day and probably as little as two-tenths of 1 percent.

The second argument which has been made is that our friends tell us that if we just stick to the United States and use all our money here to make this the best system on earth, everybody will want to imitate it. But if we do not tell them what it is, and do not tell them how it works, then they will not be able to imitate it because they will not know what it is, and they will not know just what it is we want them to imitate.

Last, the gentlemen who oppose this bill have told us before that they want to save money, they want to make the program for the world's reconstruction as inexpensive as possible. Is there any better way to save money than to convey information on the policies, the motives, and the ideas of the United States by every media of radio, movies, and press, thereby encouraging efforts at reconstruction within these countries and shortening the time within which we must assist them with the goods which these very same gentleman have constantly opposed our appropriating money for?

Obviously, what is happening is very simple. The gentlemen who always oppose every measure which would enable the United States to strike a blow for world peace by assisting with postwar reconstruction are opposing this bill.

This bill has one other very important point. It tries to inject into our foreign policy the necessary human quotient. For what is foreign policy? It is nothing but men's aspirations, their hopes, their fears, their prejudices. If we do not transmit ideas abroad we can never hope in an effective way to deal with the hopes, the fears, the prejudices, and the aspirations of the world.

Finally, this is not a program in the main for broadcasting the Voice of America. The bill has been very wisely drawn and very necessarily drawn to be a program for the exchange of men, too. That to my mind is one of its important and principal points. It proposes the exchange of technicians, of students, and of professors. It proposes to help to acquaint the people of the world personally and physically with each other. Every traveler, every soldier who has been abroad and who has seen the conditions abroad and talked with foreign peoples, will tell you that the most effective way to convince the world that America's purposes are peaceful and constructive, that we want nothing and want to exploit no one, is by having people see us in action on our home grounds. I think this bill, considering its benefits is the cheapest expenditure the Congress has been called upon to make for a very long time.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ARENDS. Let me ask the gentleman a question in all sincerity. We assume, naturally, that our students going to other nations of the world will try to teach the other nations of the world our form of living, what we are doing in our country, and tell them of our democracy, and so forth. Naturally we come to the conclusions that the people of the other states in the world will do the same when they come here. Suppose Russian students come over here and try to teach us a little more about communism. In this bill there is a provision to prohibit these students from staying here any longer, that we can deport them if their mannerisms or their characteristics are not what they should be. So what do we do? We say, "All right, we are going to deport you." I remember distinctly that only a few years ago the Congress passed a resolution to deport Harry Bridges, but it never happened. I am wondering what might happen in this instance.

Mr. JAVITS. The answer to both of the gentleman's questions is as follows:

The bill prohibits any political activity by any student, professor, or other person who comes over under its terms under penalty of prompt and summary deportation. The case is quite different from the Bridges case where he was admitted as a resident alien; these students and professors are admitted only under the specific limitations of this bill, and these provisions were drawn by the legislative counsel at the committee's request with just such a situation in mind. It is not telling us but boring from within that any American fears, and the bill fully protects us against political activities or activities not consistent with our security by those coming here under the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SIKES].

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Chairman, the headlines in the afternoon papers proclaim the fact that the Reds have taken over Bulgaria, too. Today it is Bulgaria; yesterday it was Hungary. Who tomorrow? Who is going to be next? The pattern is always the same—infiltration, boring from within, and then a coup d'état. How far will communistic totalitarianism dare to go? What is the end going to be? How will we fare if its objectives are fulfilled?

The bill now before us is going to help to determine how far communistic pressures can go, what the end will be, and what its effect on us will be.

We have decided on the foreign policy of this Nation. We are committed to a policy of aggressive world leadership. We are trying to lead the world away from war, trying to induce men to sit down together around council tables and talk out their differences; to settle them peaceably instead of resorting to war. So we are not concerned with a matter of policy today. The only question before us today is how vigorously we are prepared to back up the policy on which we have embarked. If we are going to provide the leadership which the world needs so desperately, and wants so desperately, we shall have to acquaint the world with the things that America stands for. We know how vigorously Russia pursues her propaganda activities. Concrete evidence of this has been presented to us time and again during this debate. Some of us have seen how effectively this propaganda is carried on in other countries. We know that in all such activities which are intended to foster world revolution and world communism, Russia uses her best minds. There is no limit to the number of persons used or to the amount of money expended. And they are making progress. We see evidences of that every day. There is plenty of fertile ground in the world in which to spread communistic propaganda. Where human misery abounds, and it does in so much of the world, communistic doctrine and hate propaganda find their most effective medium for growth.

By contrast, we are sending out a few outstanding men like Byrnes and Marshall, but we provide them with limited funds and inadequate personnel, often poorly paid and poorly prepared personnel. Yes, in many cases we are sending out file clerks for diplomats, and then sitting back and expecting diplomatic wonders. It cannot be done. Starvation policies will not produce results, either in the State Department or in foreign lands. We must keep abreast of the times and fight fire with fire. We must tell the world what is going on in this country and what this country stands for.

We need not concern ourselves about the threat of war—not now. But 5 years from now or 15 years from now, I do not know. Then it may be too late to concern ourselves. We must keep abreast of what is going on and match propaganda with information so that the world will know what this Nation stands for and what it is trying to do. Then our leadership will count in the world.

We have more to sell in this country than any other nation on the face of the globe. We have Americanism. There is nothing else like it. We must let the world know about it. Communism is being sold to the world today. It is time we learned to sell Americanism. We can do it if we will. This is one means of doing it.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the great Committee on Foreign Affairs, and particularly its distinguished chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON], and the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], for bringing it before the House. They have performed a real service to their country and to the world.

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I recently made.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, before we close this debate, I want to commend the Members on both sides of the aisle on the splendid spirit of nonpartisanship shown here today. I am glad that there is a general understanding of the great problems now confronting our country in the foreign field and that it is generally realized that we must make the voice of America heard and understood throughout the world.

I wish to pay tribute to the great chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON], who has worked so long and hard for world understanding and cooperation. May I pay tribute to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], chairman of the subcommittee and author of this bill, who has so effectively led the forces in favor of this program?

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman from South Carolina for his kind expressions, and I reciprocate them.

I now yield the remainder of the time, 5 minutes, to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, first of all I wish to pay tribute to our brilliant and distinguished colleague, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], He, with his subcommittee, has worked very hard and very wisely in the preparation of this bill. He has had the unanimous support of the membership of the whole committee on both sides. He has brought a good bill here, although we admit that no single piece of legislation will meet all the requirements of this vast and complex problem.

I thank the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RICHARDS] for his kind words. I have a very profound affection and regard for him, as I have for his colleagues. It is encouraging once in a while in the political rough and tumble to get something besides a brickbat.

I want to stress the necessity for this legislation. I join with everyone in disgust and disappointment over the absurd failure and unnecessary mistakes and of this program in days recently gone by. When, for example, I saw that unspeakable picture of a fat prostitute designed to be sent out over the world as a picture of American womanhood, I almost gave up in despair. But that has gone over the dam, with a great many damns along with it, well deserved, and we now confront a situation from which there is absolutely no escape.

This world is shaken to its foundation. Every race everywhere is disturbed, spiritually as well as economically and politically—shaken from all their old foundations. God only knows what the future will mean for our children and for future generations in all the world; but one thing is certain, we are going to go up or down together, and this Nation of ours stands today as the one great leader, I believe ordained of God, to call the rest of the world into a time of hope and progress, after the chaos resulting from war. This is why I want to see America interpreted to mankind so that our leadership will receive full understanding and response.

What is America? It is not boots and shoes and gadgets to be sold, as one gentleman here seemed to think today. It is not a certain way of acquiring automobiles or bank buildings or bank accounts. Somebody asked me the other day, "What is America?" I answered, and you must forgive a poor ex-preacher for this point of view: "America is a beautiful soul." That is what has made America a spiritual and material power: A passion to be free, a consciousness of the dignity of the individual made in the image of God, a great passion that men should have full opportunity to realize themselves. That is the spiritual reality that we mean when we say "America."

What is an American? An American is a man whose soul loves the soul of America. No matter what color he is, what his politics may be, what part of the world he may be born in, if his spirit responds to the spirit of freedom that created this country and made it the hope of the world, he is an American.

Our problem now, Mr. Chairman, is to make Americanism dominant in every portion of the world. The only way to do that is to drive out bad ideas by putting good ones in their place and keeping them there.

I hope this legislation will go through, and I hope the Government will summon men of vision, men of spiritual passion and understanding, to organize and develop this program and make it a success.

The first step, as I see it, is for the Members of this House to overcome their fears and anxieties and prejudices and vote for this legislation. Let us do a good job—while we are at it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired; all time has expired.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE I—SHORT TITLE, OBJECTIVES, AND DEFINITIONS

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This act may be cited as the "United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1947."

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I submit a preferential motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HOFFMAN moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 5 minutes.

ARE WE AS DUMB AS WE SEEM?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, leaving out all reference to purposes and motives, let us take a look at what we are doing.

Not long ago the Congress voted $350,000,000 to be used to aid the unfortunate people of Europe. That appropriation was made not only because we are kind-hearted, solicitous for the welfare of others, but for the added reason that we desire to stop the spread of communism.

The argument was that hungry, suffering people were more apt to listen to and adopt false teachings than were those more comfortably situated.

Then we came out in the open, and, yielding to the President's plea, the Congress voted $400,000,000 military aid and access to billions of dollars of war-surplus supplies to aid the Governments of Greece and Turkey. Again the effort to frighten our people in order to get them to support this measure. The argument was made that Russia, with its communistic hordes, was marching south and east.

Assume for the moment and for the sake of the argument that our fears were justified and that to protect ourselves from Russian aggression, from the march of communism, it was necessary to use our dollars, our materials, and our men to stop communism at the Turkish frontier, a doctrine to which I do not subscribe, let us examine our subsequent action.

Having embarked on a policy which will cost billions of dollars, mountains of materials, and perhaps the lives of a million or more Americans if war comes as a result of that, the other body, day before yesterday, ratified a treaty with Italy. Under that treaty, and a policy which we have adopted, billions of our dollars will go into Italy and of those dollars, Russia, under the present treaty will get from Italy one hundred million.

Will someone please tell us why we should give our dollars, our materials, and the services of our men to stop the Russians and Communists from moving south and east, and at the same time make it possible for Russia to obtain money from Italy which can supply it only because of our money and material; from Italy which contributes only because of our insistence, thus using the aid which Russia receives from us through Italy to strengthen the movement of the Communists south and east?

But, Mr. Chairman, the height of absurdity is reached here today in this proposed legislation. Under this bill we are asked to authorize the expenditure of additional billions which when expended will tend to defeat the objectives which we are told we are seeking to obtain when we appropriate the seven-hundred-odd-million dollars for foreign aid and for aid to Greece and Turkey.

Millions of the taxpayers' money are to be spent to stop communism in Greece and Italy, and now today, by this bill, we are asked to authorize the expenditure of other millions to bring teachers of communism here where in American schools, colleges, and universities and in public forums they can, and they will, advocate the acceptance of communism.

Apparently what we need is some sort of institution to examine and determine whether we are sane, dumb, foolish, or just emotionally overwhelmed with theories handed to us from abroad, or by those the Republicans in days gone by, characterized as wide-eyed, long-haired fuzzy-wuzzies.

Into my office within the last few days have come hundreds of cards from farmers protesting the cuts in the appropriation bill for the Agriculture Department. Those cuts were made because it was necessary to cut down on our expenditures. We have taken the money away from our own farmers and now are told we must give it to the State Department to spend to bring guest speakers of communism to teach our children what they should do.

When will the Republicans who are hanging onto the tail of the "international kite," let go, get back to earth and common sense?

I have voted to cut domestic appropriations time and again because I thought this Government of ours needed a little economy. Now, you turn around here, denying to the farmers of the country the money they asked to enable them to improve their production in order to feed the hungry people across the seas, and you appropriate those same dollars you asked me to take from the home folks to bring Communists over here to undermine our Government. Does that make sense? To me it does not. I am telling you, I am getting pretty tired of voting against the interests of my farmers or what they think is their interest, voting against my own interest from a political standpoint, and having some Members of this House, some of them Republicans, dish out millions upon millions of dollars to these foreign governments and to the New Dealers and left-wingers on one pretext after the other. Why does the Congress do it? I would like someone to tell me.

Mr. CHELF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CHELF. The gentleman does not sincerely believe that Russia is going to let anybody come over here and teach us anything, does he?

Mr. HOFFMAN. What is the idea then of appropriating the money? Why waste the money?

Mr. CHELF. The gentleman does not believe that Russia is going to let teachers come over here and teach us anything, does he?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Why, certainly, if we are fools enough to accept their teaching. Does not the gentleman know that Russia has been doing that very thing for the last 10 or 15 years. Does not the gentleman know that some of them have already been convicted? What does the gentleman think Browder and Foster have been doing for the last 20 years?

Mr. CHELF. I am talking about under this bill. They do not want their stooges enlightened by us capitalists.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That is the object of this—have us pay for their propaganda. This bill will let them come over here and teach our young folks, not the old folks—we are too hard-headed—but take the youth of the land and teach them communism, and we, under subsection 3, pay them $10 a day to do it. I say it is all nonsense.

Mr. CHELF. Do not undersell the youth of America.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. I want to say to the gentleman from Kentucky that Russia has her instructors in almost every college in America teaching communism and undermining America.

Mr. HOFFMAN. And under this bill we are going to pay them for coming over here, feed and house them, and probably clothe them, and wine and dine them while they are here. See section 4, page 13 of the bill for the authorization for entertainment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. Chairman, first of all I want to commend the attitude of the gentleman from Michigan in asking unanimous consent to withdraw his motion because along with the rest of us he would like to expedite the public business and get along with a consideration of the merits of the resolution.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Why did not the gentleman give us some time then so we could discuss the merits long ago?

Mr. MUNDT. I am sorry, we only had 60 minutes. I did not have the time. I would have been glad to have given some of it to the gentleman if I would have had more time.

I do not now want to take much time discussing the particular motion to recommit to the committee because the gentleman himself has offered to withdraw the motion and wants to continue discussion of the bill. I want to correct one misunderstanding, however, which has arisen about this bill. It does not provide any place, anywhere, for paying the expenses of foreigners who want to come to this country. He said we would be paying Communists to come to this country. Such is not the case. This legislation simply corrects a situation which now exists rather than creating the conditions which he said might exist if this bill becomes law.

As I said in the debate earlier, there are now 3,696 Russians in this country today who came here quite apart from any relationship whatsoever to this bill. If you read the language on page 3, you cannot miss it. When this bill becomes law it will no longer be possible for the Russians to have 3,696 people in this country while denying Americans the right to visit their country. We are correcting in this bill that which the gentleman complains is taking place, but we are not creating the problem; we are, in fact, correcting it. As to the second aspect, about somebody coming over to our schools and teaching our children communism, I call your attention to the language, mostly in monosyllabic words, on line 21, page 3:

> If the Secretary finds that any person from another country, while in the United States pursuant to this section, is engaged in activities of a political nature or in activities not consistent with the security of the United States, the Secretary shall promptly report such finding to the Attorney General.

That is a safeguard not now existing. We write that into law when we pass this legislation. It does not become operative unless we pass the bill, but if we pass the bill, then it becomes an effective safeguard.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman just what article 4 on page 15 means, if it does not mean expenses of travel throughout the United States for foreign-born itinerants.

Mr. MUNDT. That is something entirely different. Of course, we provide for information tours. We have been doing that with the Belgian editors. We have been doing that with the Argentine journalists, and we have been doing that for many years with people that we officially entertain in this country. It does not provide for payment of tuition in colleges and educating other people unless we deliberately bring to America designated groups or individuals that we ourselves are eager to have educated in and about America.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. What does section 3 mean then?

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COUDERT. In order that the RECORD may be quite clear, I think the gentleman has stated it, but I would like to have him state it even more clearly, is it the intent of the committee that drafted and sponsored this bill that the provision on page 3, section 201, to the effect that the Secretary is authorized to provide for interchanges, and so forth, does not in any way mean that there is any obligation to pay the expenses of such interchanges?

Mr. MUNDT. The gentleman is correct. There is no obligation. If at some time the United States finds, as it may well find, that it is desirable to bring additional students from a country like China, we could, if there were an authorized expenditure for such a purpose, make payments, but there is no obligation at all in the language of the bill requiring the United States to do so. It is not at all contemplated as a general policy.

Mr. COUDERT. The reason I asked the question is because, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I want to be sure just exactly what the intent of this bill is so that when the Departments comes to us and says we want "x" million dollars to transport students from abroad and keep them here we know just what was intended by the Congress in enacting this bill.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JUDD. There may be many countries from which it is important that students come to this country, and which cannot get American exchange to support them here. In those cases it would be possible under this language—and it is intended—that the United States should assist in the transportation and maintenance of those students. Almost invariably arrangements can be made with the university or college where they study in America for them to have free tuition or scholarships, but their transportation and maintenance might be provided by us in certain cases where it is in our national interest to do so.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, with that explanation before us, I ask that the motion to recommit be defeated.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to recommit offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

The motion was rejected.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, as I understand, the purpose of this bill is to sell America to the rest of the world. There is an old saying that if a man is honest he need not go around telling people about it, his actions will speak louder than his words. If America has not been sold to the world in the last 160 years, I doubt very much if $31,000,000 is going to sell it to the world now. For 100 years or more the people of the Old World have been coming to this land in such large numbers that 25 years ago it was necessary to put the bars up to pass a law known as the quota law. They had heard about America. I suppose there are many Members on the floor of this House like myself whose parents both came from the Old World, long before the days of the War Between the States. They had heard about America and its government of freedoms. Since that time they have come in such increasing numbers that as I say, we put the bars up. In that period of time the people who came to America have been in constant communication with their relatives, their friends, and their neighbors across the sea. They were told of the blessings of liberty and life here. You have never heard of any exodus of these people from our shores. A recent poll taken in England of people between the ages of 18 and 30 on whether they desired to emigrate to America showed 80 percent in favor of doing so. In Italy over 90 percent were in favor.

You say that America has not been sold to the world? Let me say as a member of a committee who left the shores of the United States less than 2 years ago and journeyed in some 15 countries of Europe with one exception people came to us and asked if there was not something we could do to help them come to the great United States. If America, this land of opportunity, has not been sold to the people of Europe would they be so eager to come to the United States?

Not long ago I was talking with Mr. Constantine Brown, foreign news analyst for the Washington Star, a very distinguished journalist and columnist at the very top of his profession and nationally known. He spent the first 4 months of this year in various countries of the old world, Europe particularly. His statement to me was: "All of Europe would like to come to the United States if they were permitted to do so." Do you think it is necessary to sell the United States to the rest of the world, when you go to foreign countries and stand in the presence of long rows of white crosses of the men who wore the uniform of our country and died in the cause of liberty and freedom? Do you think it is necessary to sell the United States to the rest of the world after we have spent some three hundred billion dollars and sacrificed the lives of 300,000 of our precious American boys? Europe knows that hardly a nation or a people across the ocean but has received aid from us. One of the problems of our army of occupation in Germany while I was there—the summer of 1945—was to keep the Germans who were in the Russian zone of occupation from coming into the American zone of occupation. They know us well and knew they would be better treated under our flag? Of course they know.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JUDD. There is no man in this House for whom I have greater respect than I have for the gentleman from Michigan, and I am sure his people in Detroit, Mich., have that same feeling, based on his integrity, ability, and devotion to duty. But does not the gentleman find it necessary and advisable periodically to go back to Detroit to tell his people what he has done here and why he did it? Is his good work here enough, unless he describes it to them, and explains the reasons for his actions? Does not the gentleman find that of value to him?

Mr. DONDERO. Perhaps it is what I stand for and what I do and the way I vote in this Chamber rather than what I say back home.

Mr. JUDD. Do not you have to have both—the deed plus the word?

Mr. DONDERO. May I suggest that this $31,000,000 might be better spent, if it must be spent, in cleaning up some of the problems here at home rather than to try and tell the rest of the world what it already knows. This bill is unnecessary and a waste of public money. I trust this bill will be defeated.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. I am under the impression that the gentleman is in error. He is laboring under the impression that this aims to encourage immigration. This bill has nothing to do with immigration nor does it advocate immigration.

Mr. DONDERO. Not at all. I know perfectly well the purpose of the legislation.

Mr. RIZLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIZLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think I realize the futility of attempting to defeat this bill, but since we may not have a chance to cast a record vote, certainly I do not want the record to be silent as to my position in connection with this matter.

Of course, I do not question the good faith of anyone or the right of anyone to support this sort of legislation. I can well understand how my friends on the other side of the aisle would be all out for a program that may call for $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 or $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 to be expended during the campaign year of 1948 by the executive branch of the Government. I do not blame them. This bill has some peculiar things in it. In the first place, there is no limit to the amount that can be appropriated. Section 601 on page 12 says, and I quote, "Appropriations to carry out the purposes of this act are hereby authorized." How much? There is no limitation. Certainly, under the present leadership, I assume that Mr. TABER would not go hog wild. But there is no limitation whatever upon the amount that may be spent for this sort of a program—no limitation whatever—a blanket authority to the Committee on Appropriations to spend all of America's substance if necessary. This is too much authority to place in the hands of good men. But our friends supporting this bill say it is a program to sell America to the rest of the world.

Sell America? I wonder if the Gold Star Mothers of World War I in this country whose sons are sleeping over there think that it is necessary to sell to Europe and the rest of the world the interest of America in breaking up dictatorships and aggressors. I wonder if the Gold Star Mothers of World War II think that it is necessary to spend a lot of money now to sell the people of Europe and other parts of the world on the greatness of America.

We sent our kids over there in two world wars to fight. Thousands of them are seleeping on foreign soil as a sacrifice to American ideals.

Someone said recently that we had spent $15,000,000,000 since the close of World War II, in aid to the rest of the world. The facts are that a recent survey shows that more than $20,000,000,000 in technical and economic assistance has gone abroad in the past 2 years. Fifty-nine countries are benefiting today from United States economic and technical assistance extended since the end of fighting in world War II, and then the proponents of this measure say that it is necessary for us to go on an all-out spending spree, in order to convince the rest of the world that America loves them and wants to help them.

The money spent and converted in this tremendous program to help rehabilitate a war-torn world, includes $12,000,000,000 in loans, direct grants and relief expenditures, lend-lease, and surplus property credits and expenditures on collateral and technical cooperation projects, plus this country's $2,700,000,000 contribution to UNRRA and $5,925,000,000 subscriptions to the world bank and monetary fund.

A partial break-down by countries, according to a survey made by Mr. Garnett D. Horner, shows the all-out pouring out of the public purse strings by Uncle Sam, to aid in rehabilitating countries everywhere in the world:

Albania: United States' share of UNRRA supplies from June 30, 1945, to June 30, 1946, was $13,052,284. Additional $27,450,000 allotted by UNRRA in July 1946.

My very able friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] a master at this microphone, read a whole list of lies that had been published in Pravda and other places about the United States of America by the Russian press and Russian radio. Does he mean to imply that we should start on a program of lying ourselves to offset the lies that he says Russia is telling about us? Is that the implication to be drawn from his statement?

If the people whom we expect to reach by this broadcast are not "sold" now on the American way of life and the largeness of the American heart, then we had better give them up as a bad job. Certainly if they have not been sold by the practices of America in keeping with the philosophy of the Saviour when he said, "I was hungry and you gave me food; I was thirsty and you gave me drink; I was naked and you clothed me"—they are not going to be sold by a bunch of high-powered radio commentators' slick tongues who are able to put out a multitude of expensive, honeyed words.

If we want to do a better job of selling America, let us spend some more money by increasing our Embassies and our Legations, and sending genuine Americans over to inhabit the Embassies and the Legations—rather than pouring out millions of dollars over short-wave broadcasts which necessarily must be largely lost in the air because of the absence of receiving sets at the other end of the ether waves. Does anyone believe for a moment that Uncle Joe Stalin is going to permit the Communists in Russia to keep short-wave radio sets to listen to American broadcasts?

We better be realistic about this business. We Republicans in the House said we were going to cut the budget $6,000,000,000—did we mean what we said? Well, we cannot cut the budget if we continue to vote unlimited authority for unlimited appropriations on schemes of this kind.

I make the bold statement that if everyone in the House will read this bill in its present form, without comment from anyone, that there would not be 50 votes in favor of the bill.

This bill should be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs for further study.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I think that perhaps a woman can speak from her heart about the thoughts and feelings of women, wives, and mothers, whether they be gold star or blue star or whatever they may be. We have a gold star mother in the House. I have not talked with her as to her feelings about this bill. I do not know how she feels, but I do know that the women of this country do not want any more wars and that they are willing to expend everything, save only their honor, in whatever seems wise to set up the kind of a climate that peace can live in. That is a climate where there is understanding, and there cannot be understanding unless there is exchange of thought and ideas. The best way to get exchange of thought and ideas is in exchange of personnel. There has been so much said about this radio program. I am all for it. As it happens I know something about international radio. I know it is not easy, if you give up your frequencies to get them back again. There is truth in what has been said on this floor in that regard. I think it would be the height of stupidity for us to lose hold of the air rights that we have. It has not been easy to get them. If you are familiar with the Havana Conference and so forth, where all the radio people met and tried to do each other out of wave bands. To relinquish our bands, would be little less than stupid.

I would like to emphasize the exchange of teachers, of students, of technicians, of specialists of all sorts with all the countries of the world. There are other countries in the world than Russia. Why do we do nothing but talk about Russia, Russia, Russia? Yes; she is the other big titan, that is true. She is a very strong country, we hear, but is she not a very weak country, really, for she does not have even the fundamentals of right living. She does not know what it is to do something for the other fellow. She has not learned that the height of happiness is to do something for somebody else. Without such knowledge no nation has begun to live.

We who are women want every possible thing done that will lead to greater understanding. We want to open the paths to the consciousness of other people. We want them to know what it is we have here, even though it is still imperfect. This bill has been most carefully worked over by our committee and by our subcommittee limiting and protecting where such provisions were necessary. I am certain this House is going to pass this legislation for I have confidence in the sanity and judgment of the Members of this House. Through this program, well used, we shall be setting up two-way roads to understanding. All who want from us will be giving us much in return as the exchange of skills, of ideas, of ever-increasing fellowship slowly bridge the dark river of doubt that must be spanned as we build the great highway to peace.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, as far as the foreign broadcasts are concerned there may be some merit in them when they tell what America thinks; but I was utterly disgusted with the broadcasts that went out from the State Department to Russia while Henry Wallace and Harold Stassen were over there misleading the people of Europe as to what the American people thought. They reminded me of the Irishman who came back from a trip to France and said the French were so dumb that he could hardly make them understand their own language.

If you will provide that a copy of every broadcast be sent to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the President pro tempore of the Senate for the inspection of the Members after it is sent, in order that we may know what is going on, that program might have some merit; but if you are going to put a bunch of semi-Reds down there to pump a lot of Red propaganda into Europe to mislead them as to what the American people think, you will be doing the American people irreparable harm.

Another thing, you provide in the bill for the exchange of professors. God knows if we could send out of this country a boatload of professors once a month for a while, we might be doing this country a great deal of good.

And talk about deporting anybody. It is all we can do to get Eisler tried, much less deported.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. ARENDS. And we could not even deport Harry Bridges despite a resolution of Congress.

Mr. RANKIN. No; and we could not even deport Harry Bridges. The Supreme Court finally made him a citizen.

These Communist professors are in almost every college in America, and they are undermining and destroying confidence in this Government and trying to destroy the American way of life. I am speaking from the cards, because I have heard the testimony, and read the testimony, taken by the Committee on Un-American Activities.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. If we cannot reform the Communists who are here in America, how can we hope to reform the Communists in their own back yard?

Mr. RANKIN. Certainly we cannot.

Great Britain is not asking to send any teachers over here. These teachers will come from behind the iron curtain. That is where they will come from—Russia.

I would like to vote for a reasonable bill, but there should be some amendments taking out the vicious portion of this measure.

I realize that it is a good thing for the rest of the world to know about America, but do you think they do not already know? Do you think they do not know now that we are going to send propaganda there? Do you think this is going to help if we send propaganda there to try to make them believe that the United States is on its way to communism? If you let some men broadcast that is the kind of doctrine they will get.

I submit this bill ought to be seriously amended. There ought to be a provision that a copy of every broadcast should be sent to the Speaker of the House and the President pro tempore of the Senate to be inspected by the Members of Congress that we may know what is being told to the people in Europe. Then there are these provisions here for bringing people over to this country from behind the iron curtain. That provision should be eliminated. We have too many of that kind here now.

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. BREHM. Does not the gentleman agree with me that if the world by this time does not know our ideals and our objectives that they are just too stupid ever to understand them, regardless of any type of program which the State Department may engage in?

Mr. RANKIN. The statesmen of the world know about the American Government. After the last World War almost every government in Europe crashed. They rewrote their constitutions, or reformed their government, but not a single one of them followed the Constitution of the United States. Governments have crashed since this war closed and they have set up other kinds of government, but not a single one of them has followed the pattern of the Government of the United States.

You have a lot of propaganda going out from this country today over the radio, through picture shows and even through the press, that is misleading as to what the American people think. I for one am not willing to continue that kind of policy at Government expense.

This bill should be drastically amended or recommitted to the committee from which it came.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mrs. LUSK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in this bill. In my opinion, it is perhaps one of the most important pieces of legislation that the House will have an opportunity to consider. Because I am not a member of the committee I have not felt the necessity of speaking for the bill, as there seems to be a great deal of interest in favor of the bill. However, the gentlewoman from Ohio presented a challenge to me I feel I must accept.

I would like for you to know I feel that America has a great deal to be proud of up to this point. Our people have conducted themselves in a way that the country can be proud of and we can stand behind them. But we of the Congress cannot let them down at this point. This great task is far from being finished. Our boys have done their part. The people of this Congress must do their part at this time in helping to make the peace if we are to live up to the ideals that our servicemen established and the things they felt they were fighting for when they went overseas. I have many letters, and I am sure all of you have, outlining the things they were doing, the reasons why they were on the battlefronts, the things they felt they were doing for the people at home. It is just as important now that we carry that standard and those ideals forward and that we keep our position at the head of all nations and that we fulfill our opportunity for leadership.

Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said about the importance of education, that we must educate our children in this Nation if we are to maintain our place as a leader of nations. The world is too small now to think of only one nation when we speak of education. There is no better way for us to carry on a program of world education than through the plan presented by this bill for the Voice of America. It is very important that we help students in other nations, students who live in other lands, to understand our plan of education. We also have an opportunity to learn from them about their way of life.

For quite a long time now in the public-school program we have been exchanging student teachers with colleges of other countries in order that they would know more about our plan of teaching and our method and administration of public-school education and could go home and carry out the things we feel are important. Our student teachers have gained much in understanding of world affairs. The same purpose will be served in teaching people about our country and the things we want them to go home and teach their people. This exchange of students with other lands will have a wide influence toward creating a greater confidence and understanding of our way of life.

The plan for the Voice of America is a fine plan and I urge your support of it.

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBEY. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we can agree on time. This is the first section of the bill. There are many more sections of the bill to be read.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, I have not made a request.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Why does the gentleman want to cut us off now? At least let us talk about it. If you are going to broadcast to the whole world, let us broadcast to you a little bit.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman wants to speak I will not make the request.

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time because of the necessity of taking a plane in a short while for Chicago, and I may not be here for the final roll-call vote on this bill.

I think everyone in the House knows that I probably have criticized this program of the State Department as much if not more than any other Member. The criticisms I have leveled at the State Department have been justified. I do not hesitate to say that I believe the total number of hours I have spent right down in the State Department day after day, week after week, month after month, total more than the combined number of hours spent down there by all Members of this body. More than likely I am the only Member who has gone to New York and spent a whole day in the broadcasting station, there to find out exactly what has been going on. I criticized the art project very vigorously on the floor of the House on May 13. I criticized the personnel of this department under Mr. William Benton on May 14. I inserted in the RECORD the names of those to whom I objected and my reasons for doing so. Therefore, I believe I am qualified to speak on this particular bill. If the truth were known, in all probability I am one of the few Members of the House who has taken the time to read every single word of the hearings on this bill. Unfortunately there are some defects in it. I hope you will see fit to adopt the various amendments to remedy them.

I am extremely sorry that the committee during the hearings did not go into the personnel problem in greater detail. One of the best things that could happen to this program would be to let it die on June 30 and start a new one. Why saddle the Secretary of State, General Marshall, with all the personnel that is in the Department at the present time? Let him employ these people temporarily until he selects the ones he desires to maintain permanently on the staff.

In spite of my vigorous opposition to the program under present operation, I am going to vote for this bill, because I believe General Marshall will correct the existing situation. However, he cannot perform miracles, and I assure you that if some of the changes I am requesting are not made, I shall ask permission to bring your attention to exposures of this Department which are shocking. I feel that there is a place in the policy of our Government for a program of this kind if it is conducted properly by the right personnel, becoming and fitting to the standards of the United States of America in the eyes of the world.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHURCH. I want to commend the gentleman for his fine work. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that this bill could come to us today with better grace if William Benton would resign?

Mr. BUSBEY. That may be the gentleman's opinion, but I do not think, if he knew William Benton, that he would expect him to resign before this bill is considered by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUSBEY. I will say, however, to my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] that if this bill passes the Congress and becomes law I, for one, feel that there are many people in this country who can conduct this program much better than Mr. William Benton. I hope Mr. William Benton does resign to make room for a capable administrator, because he has not done everything he should have done to correct his personnel problem in the State Department.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBEY. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD of Montana. As a member of the committee who listened to Mr. Benton, I want to go on record as expressing my full confidence in him as the administrator of this program, and express the hope that we will continue to have him if this program is continued in the future. I think he is a good, sound, American.

Mr. BUSBEY. The gentleman is entitled to his opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, the gentlewoman from Ohio said very seriously, "Those who want from us will give to us." I have not seen that in operation yet but I hope to live to see it in operation. When that comes about, we will be all right from then on as far as our budget and one thing and another is concerned.

I am going to vote against this bill. I have weighed it for some time in my mind and come to some conclusions which I am willing to defend.

A businessman in my town who came here from Europe in the twenties and has done well and made money came down here and wanted me to fix him up and get the necessary papers so he could go over to Europe to gather up the remnants of his family and some of his friends if he could find them. He spent nearly 3 months over there. I had quite a conversation with him recently. He carried a considerable sum of money from other people in America for their friends over there, so that he might go through the narrow streets and hunt for these poor people. He said that everywhere he went the people are thankful for what America has done except in England where, he said, you cannot find a man who does not take pride in telling you to your face that the only reason America got in the war was to save our own necks. But as far as Europe was concerned, he said, we should not send any money over there. They will never help themselves as long as we continue to do it.

It does not make any difference how much information you put back of the iron curtain, even if you get it to the people, because they are helpless. It is like selling religion in the world through the centuries; to sell religion to the poor beggar in the street who had no influence or prestige does not get you anywhere. What we have done over there does not help the little people. The politicians are satisfied with the ignorance of the people and their power over them. It keeps them in their positions.

He said that in the five countries he visited he did not come to a place where he could not buy a steak when he wanted it. He said it was costly, that they charged you for your napkin, they charged you for your knife and fork, and they charged you for your chair to sit on, but you could get it.

He said that he left there in the twenties and they had two classes there then, and they have two classes today. The only badly off people he found were the displaced persons. You will not help them with this information and the expenditure of more money. I am not voting for any more money to go out of this country to Europe.

He said, and I believe him, for he is honest and his friends are over there, that they will never help themselves as long as we continue to dump money in there and make bums out of them.

I said, "How about communism over there?" He said, "You do not see or hear much of it. They do not call it that and do not talk about it. A man who employs less than 30 people is on his own and has hard going, but a man who employs more than 30 people has government aid. He has material that he has to give to the government."

So you can see those governments are doing nothing for their poor people. They never did. They always had two classes and they have two classes now. He said he saw no beggars compared to what he saw in the twenties when he left Europe, because the poor are getting relief, and the others are getting along. I said, "How about merchandising?" He said, "It is as good as it is here, in the five countries where I was." I said, "Where did they get the merchandise?" He said, "They are manufacturing and they are importing. The stores are full of people. There is a lot of money, but the people are doing nothing for themselves."

So I am not going to support this legislation. You can talk all you want about the iron curtain, but the people behind the iron curtain are helpless. The few who are in control dominate. That applies all along over there. Those governments, those political leaders, have never done anything for their poor, and they will not do anything for them now except to continue to feed them.

This information comes from the grass roots, from a man seeking his friends. He said he smuggled several of his friends out of Poland across the border. I said, "How did you do it?" He said, "You can do anything over there with money. It is all black market, double cross, and graft. You stroll down to the border with some money in your pocket and say to the guards, 'You stroll,' and they will stroll." He said, "You can take as many friends across the border as you want to. As long as you are only going over there with money you are only building up graft, double cross, and backmail."

Now, my friend is a businessman and he has a genuine interest in his friends and relatives and I am taking his advice.

I will not vote for another dollar to go over there when we have so much need over here with an unbalanced budget. You Republicans ought to remember that you promised a balanced budget. You promised to save money. Now, show that you mean what you said.

Mr. COUDERT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, like my colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUSBEY], I, too, supported my colleagues on the Committee on Appropriations subcommittee on the State Department, under the chairmanship of the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska, in striking out the appropriation requested for this activity of the State Department.

I have no doubt that on the record before them that subcommittee was fully justified and that the House was fully justified because of the inadequacy and the deficiencies in the execution of the program. For my part, in voting as I did to do that, I was actuated primarily by a desire to call attention to an inadequate and improperly conducted program and clear the underbrush so that we could start afresh with a new operation in a very important field. To my mind, there is one and only one justification for this program, so much of a justification that I can hardly, I am ashamed to say, see the other side.

In effect, if we turn down this bill we are taking from our Government a weapon, a potent weapon, in the great conflict of the times that we are living in; as much so as though we gave up the atomic bomb, although there is, of course, a difference.

This is a weapon. We are confronted today in this troubled and dangerous world with the choice of two alternatives, it seems to me. One: We may succeed, and God help us if we do not, in bringing about some semblance of peace through cooperation and bona fide efforts of the United Nations or a similar organization; and, failing that, we are headed, I fear, into a tragic and inevitable conflict with that other great power that seems determined to achieve peace solely by conquest of the entire civilized world.

In either alternative, the part that is played by the United States is going to be enormous. We are the other great power. I think we are the great power. To say to our Government and to our Department of State that you shall not be permitted to use—that you shall be deprived of one of the greatest of modern weapons, the weapon of ideas, the promulgation of idea—propaganda, if you like—is to say, in effect, that you are deprived of a great and vital weapon. It is for that reason, Mr. Chairman, that I think we should pass this bill because in principle it is sound and in principle it is necessary. I am not so concerned as to its form; it may be that it could be improved by amendments.

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COUDERT. I yield.

Mr. BREHM. Should we still go ahead with compulsory military training if these beautiful ideals are going to work? Do we need them both?

Mr. COUDERT. I am very much afraid that we may need them all, because if we fail to achieve peace through cooperation we will be faced with the greatest danger since this Republic was born, and there is no weapon that we can afford to give up and there is no potential friend or ally from one end of the world to the other whom we can afford to neglect or surrender.

I hope the bill passes.

Mr. BREHM. Talk softly and carry a big stick; is that right? An olive branch in this hand and a sword in the other hand? It does not make sense.

Mr. COUDERT. I am afraid so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COUDERT] has expired.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the required number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I take this time to call attention to some of the provisions of this bill that have not been discussed during the entire 2 hours of debate, and only briefly touched upon.

The distinguished gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] said there was no provision for paying the expenses of citizens or subjects of other countries or for paying their traveling expenses included in this bill.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Not at present. I read from section 702, line 20, page 14, of the bill:

> In carrying on activities which further the purposes of this act, subject to approval of such activities by the Secretary, the Department, and the other Government agencies are authorized—> under such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe, to pay the transportation expenses, and not to exceed $10 per diem in lieu of subsistence and other expenses, of citizens or subjects of other countries, without regard to the Standardized Government Travel Regulations and the Subsistence Act of 1926, as amended;

And now I read from page 15, line 8, item No. 3—

> (4) under such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe, without regard to the Standardized Government Travel Regulations and the Subsistence Act of 1926, as amended, to provide for planned travel itineraries within the United States by groups of citizens or subjects of other countries, to pay the expenses of such travel, and to detail, as escorts of such groups, officers and employees of the Government, whose expenses may be paid out of funds advanced or transferred by the Secretary for the general expenses of the itineraries.

Mr. MUNDT. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. COLE of Missouri. I still refuse to yield because I want to complete the reading of these provisions in the bill.

> (5) to make grants for, and to pay expenses incident to, training and study—

All that I have read applies to citizens and subjects of other countries.

Mr. Chairman, the section I shall now read, in my opinion, does not even rise to the dignity of respectable nonsense. Listen to this:

> to provide for, and pay the expenses of, attendance at meetings or conventions of societies and associations concerned with furthering the purposes of this act when provided for by the appropriation.

Mr. MUNDT. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. COLE of Missouri. I refuse to yield. Now, does that limit the societies whose expenses are to be paid to conventions? All that is required is that they be concerned with furthering the purposes of this act. Any communistic society or other society known to be subversive could avail itself of this provision if it was concerned with furthering the purposes of this act.

There are no safeguards. Furthermore, who ever heard of paying the expenses of members of private societies with taxpayers' money. I repeat, this proposition does not even rise to the dignity of respectable nonsense.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand that on the floor of the House $5,000 was appropriated for the WCTU convention in Atlantic City here recently.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. I do not remember anything about that. I most certainly did not vote for it.

I am opposed to this entire proposition and hope that this bill will be defeated.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I have consistently throughout this session supported President Truman and General Marshall in what I thought to be their foreign policy. When it came to the Greek-Turkish loan I did not hesitate but voted for it because I believed that it would accomplish its announced purpose, which was to stop the rising tide of communism in Europe.

Then when this bill came up today, as far as the title is concerned "The Voice of America," I am for that at least as far as radio broadcasting is concerned. It will not help much but it will not hurt anything. But I do think there is one provision in here that is dangerous, and it is this section here providing for the exchange of students, professors, and technicians.

I am a little surprised that the author of the bill, the distinguished gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], a member of the Un-American Activities Committee, a man who ought to know the way the Communists work by infiltration in educational institutions, surprised that he would bring this thing in here at this time. Now, 3, 4, or 5 years from now when we get a little more settled condition in the world it may be all right to let them send their teachers here. You know what they will be, they will be teachers of economics, they will be teachers of history and government, they will be teachers of politics. Those are the fields in which they will work their subversive influence.

Now, you talk about good will. You do not have to talk about the boys who lie dead over on Normandy and Omaha beaches, you do not have to talk about the boys who did not come back from Europe, but for 2 years we had two or three million of the best ambassadors of good will scattered over the face of Europe that could possibly be found. They performed many acts of kindness. They were kind to the children of France, Belgium, Luxemburg. They shared their rations with them and gave them their candy bars. They made love to the girls in those countries, they broke their windows, they had their little differences, but they gave their chocolates to the children and cigarettes to the adults. These more than offset the little irritations.

To say that this program can take the place of the three or four million ambassadors of good will we had over there is just asinine, it is ridiculous, it is nonsense.

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. JACKSON of California. I wonder if the gentleman knows, touching the matter of subversive activities, that this bill has the unqualified support of the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the AMVETS, and that practically every Member who fought in the last war is for this resolution today?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I do not know anything about the Veterans of Foreign Wars; I do not know anything about the American Legion, or anyone else being for it; but I do know that in the light of our past experience, certain provisions of this bill are utterly inadequate.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Does not the gentleman think it a pretty good idea to listen to what the Members of Congress have to say who came back from over there?

Mr. JACKSON of California. I think the returned veteran is the one to speak, the ones who bears the scars of battle upon them. They are not opposing this bill in Congress today.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I will say this. I spent 2 years in Europe, and I am against this exchange of workers and students provision. The gentleman made a great deal of this little magazine Amerika of which the State Department distributed 50,000 copies and told us about its being so dog-eared after the Russians got through reading it. I just wonder how long since Joe Stalin has been anxious for us to send over that booklet telling about Abraham Lincoln and the capitalist system? That is what is told in that booklet. If Joe Stalin wants that kind of stuff sent into Russia, why are we spending $400,000,000 to stop Russia in Turkey? If Joe Stalin is getting down to this "old buddy" kind of stuff, then the hundreds of millions we are spending are going to waste.

Talk about exchanging teachers, professors, and technicians. I well remember the experiences we had in 1938 when we had an exchange with German professors in some of our universities. They would get hold of graduates from West Point or Annapolis, pump them dry, and then 2 years later sink them in the North Atlantic. That is what we are going to get now. Why do we want Russian professors over here teaching economics and government? Why do we want a Russian professor over here talking to his roommate and preaching communism to him? Oh, you say he can be deported. Well, some of the gentlemen will tell you how hard it is to get the Attorney General to deport Mr. Gerhart Eisler. Here you are giving them the cloak of legality to come in and preach communism. They will not be Eislers. They will be here under the sanctity of the law. It is just ridiculous and that portion of it should be taken out of the bill.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. ELLIS. I call the gentleman's attention to page 5, section 301. It appears that anyone can be brought into this country on the approval of the Secretary of State. In other words, just get on the boat and come over here. But if it is proven that he is undesirable he has to be returned under the immigration laws.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Yes. Who is going to check on them?

Mr. ELLIS. It seems like they can come in on invitation by the Secretary of State, but if they are found to be undesirable they have to go back under the immigration law of 1917. If anybody knows of anyone who has been sent back or disturbed under that law I would like for that gentleman to tell us this afternoon. That man will be here just as safe as you are as long as he wants to stay.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I am sure of that.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JUDD. The gentleman knows all the students and professors he has talked about have not come here under this program. They came in under the laws that existed long before this bill, and still exist. Does not the gentleman realize that we are making an effort here to correct, not aggravate the situation? We are trying to do two things: To put on a reciprocal basis those countries which have been sending students and professors to us but who have been unwilling to let ours go to them, and to assist in interchange of students and professors between the United States and dozens of countries besides Russia, countries that we are not afraid of and that are not sending over political agents, and whose good will and understanding we desire and need.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to permit me to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be granted five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, it seems to me that we should get further than the first section of this bill before we start giving additional time.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, we have not had much opportunity. Give us a chance to air our views.

Mr. MUNDT. I have no desire to cut the gentleman off but I do not want to give an extension of time to everyone.

Mr. GAVIN. The gentleman has not had an opportunity to speak. He has been questioned here. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given an additional 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma indicates he does not want the time.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words.

Mr. Chairman, on November 5 of last year there was a change in the political complexion of this House on the promise of those who ran on the Republican ticket that they would quit the doctrine or idea of saving at the spigot and wasting at the bunghole. Do not think for 1 minute that the people of this country do not know that we have been making these vast appropriations for foreign relief. I voted for the $400,000,000 for Greece and Turkey. They know that since this war closed, when we were saddled with a debt of $300,000,000,000, that we have spent an additional $15,000,000,000 in Europe and in Asia.

I want to just talk to you for a few minutes about the provisions of the bill and what it really means. There has not been much said about it. This bill is the largest, most far-reaching blank check for power and money, provided they can get it, that has ever been before this House. Now listen to the provisions:

SEC. 701. In carrying out the purposes of this act, the Secretary is authorized, in addition to and not in limitation of the authority otherwise vested in him—

(1) * * * to make grants of money, services, or materials to State and local governmental institutions in the United States, to governmental institutions in other countries, and to individuals and public or private nonprofit organizations both in the United States and in other countries.

There is an unlimited power of attorney that you give to the Secretary of State to give money, materials, and anything he sees fit to any nation and anybody in the world, at any time, in any amount.

2. To furnish, sell, or rent, by contract or otherwise, educational and information materials and equipment for dissemination to, or use by, peoples of foreign countries.

Now, if you want to vote for that and then face the angry members of the parent-teacher associations of this country who are showering this House with protests against cutting the school-lunch program to the extent of $30,000,000, why, go to it. If you want to get on a wagon like that and ride and be in the attitude of a drunken man taking a joy ride in the dark, who knows he is on the wagon but does not know where in the hell he is going, why, go to it.

To go on:

3. Whenever necessary in carrying out title V of this act, to purchase, rent, construct, improve, maintain, and operate facilities for radio transmission and reception, including the leasing of real property, both within and without the continental limits of the United States, for periods not to exceed 10 years, or for longer periods if provided for by the appropriation act.

Did you know that was in there? That is worth knowing when you vote on this thing.

4. To furnish official entertainment necessary for the purposes of this act.

I have heard that word "entertainment" in acts before. I always tremble when a representative of this country goes abroad to negotiate with representatives of foreign countries, because I remember that we never lost a war but never won a conference. I remember that when our representatives started out for Yalta we took with us bourbon and scotch, and Stalin took vodka and champagne, and from what happened there his vodka and his champagne were more potent and more bewildering than our bourbon and our scotch.

Now, the President took his son Elliott along as an official witness, and Elliott wrote a book. He said that on one occasion, when he quaffed drinks through the bubbles of the champagne, and when everybody was high, that Joe Stalin proposed a toast to the 50,000 Germans they proposed to shoot without a trial, and Elliott said—I do not doubt his veracity; the people who interviewed him cannot deny that he is entitled to some credit, because they put him on the witness stand. He claimed that Churchill was full; I doubt that. He may have been feeling good, but he seemed to have sense—he protested that toast of Stalin's and said that it was contrary to Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence and his conception of justice, and thereupon our President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, suggested a compromise, that they only shoot 49,500 without a trial.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENNINGS. Then, Elliott said, he staggered to his feet and they all joined in the toast.

When you go to explain to your constituents back home about the money you are authorizing to be appropriated for entertainment, there is just one way to entertain an international meeting, and that is with alcohol. I am not making a prohibition speech but I will make this observation: I have read history and I have observed mankind for a number of years. I never yet have heard of a drunk hero or of any man who found wisdom in the bottom of a bottle.

That is not all. Here is some more of this blank check you are asked to sign and turn somebody loose with, God only knows who:

> To establish and maintain in the United States reception centers for foreign students and for visitors representative of the fields listed in section 201 above.
> To provide for printing and binding outside the continental limits of the United States.
> To employ, without regard to the civil-service and classification laws, persons on a temporary basis, and aliens within the United States.

That is what you are asked to do. Do you want to do it?

The truth of it is, my friends, let us just wait a little bit. Why this hot haste? Why this hurry? You are fixing to do something that commits this Congress to the appropriation of uncounted millions of dollars. Why not recommit this measure and bring in a measure here that will protect the people of the United States?

Here are these bawdy pictures that they hold up as representative of the men and women and the boys and girls of the United States of America. How many million dollars did that cost the American people? Do not think for 1 minute that we got that folderol for nothing. We paid for it up into the thousands of dollars, and we caught them with the goods, caught them breaking up the hatch although they had taken time to hide the shells; we caught them with wool in their teeth, caught them in the very act. Now they come back and want more money. One of my friends over here said Mr. Benton is sponsoring this thing. He is the fellow who is responsible for it.

Let us take our time, now. Do not worry. We are spending money over there now by the millions every day.

Mr. HOFFMAN. They might have wool in their teeth, but the lady does not have any clothes on.

Mr. JENNINGS. That is the reason they painted her picture.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last 5 words.

Mr. Chairman, I am not too enthusiastic for this bill. I have some apprehension as to whether or not it will be administered as it should be. If it is, then it will be conducive towards peace, and that is why it has an appeal to me. I think this bill is 10 times, yea, a hundred times better than the Greece-Turkey matter that I opposed with all the vigor of my soul, which was not too much, I grant you; at least, it had very little effect. But I think this bill, if it becomes a law and is properly administered, will help to bring about peace.

I have not heard a word from anybody yet about what the other countries in the world might give to us. We are, in my judgment, becoming too big-headed in this country. It is liable to lead us to war and has helped to lead us to war in the past. We do not have enough of the spirit of the Master about us, I am sorry to say.

I love this country with a fervor. I would be willing to give my life, now, any time, for the old red, white, and blue. I offered it once and came near giving it on half a dozen battlefields in the First World War. I like you folk on both sides of the aisle. I have learned to think a lot of you, and I am going to like you whether you like me or not; but I am saying to you that with all the admiration I have for you and the consideration I have for you, there is too much hate in your hearts.

There is not enough real Christianity in my heart or the heart of any one of us.

Let us look at the record. Right before the last war, according to information I have gleaned from the Encyclopedia Britannica, the World Book, and other authentic publications, documents, records, and so forth, the people in Norway, Denmark, and Sweden had practically eliminated tuberculosis among their cattle; and the cheese and butter and milk from those countries brought premiums on the world markets because of their purity.

A number of other diseases which plagued us were, so I understand, eliminated by those people. So, you see, we can learn a great deal from them by exchanging students and scientific knowledge.

Why, you ask most any school child in America where the largest trees are and he will say, as I heard it alleged on the floor of the House, that they are out in California. I have a high regard for the great State of California although I was born in Texas and raised in Oklahoma, but the biggest trees in the world are not in California. We think so. Why? Because it is so easy for us all to become bigheaded, to think that everything we have is the biggest and best in the world. I can see, my friends, that this great beloved country of ours for which I am willing to give my life is about to be catapulted into an empire to try to run this world, and I am against it.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that this measure will help to bring us back to common sense. Some great man made this statement. He said, "I never met anybody in all my life who did not know more about some things than I know."

How true that is, my friends. I have never met anyone, however ignorant he might have been, whether he knew his A B C's or not—no I never met anyone who could not tell me a lot of things. I have been somewhat of a student all my life. I was admitted to the bar to practice law when I was 21 years of age. I am a former county attorney. I practiced law privately for 8½ years. I was a district judge for 9½ years. But there is a lot of law that I do not know and millions of other things I do not know.

I say to you that I believe these people coming from foreign countries can bring us some good ideas. I am not scared to death just because some might come from Russia, or some other country, and just because a few of them might get in a position where they might brag about their country, that they are going to turn us communistic. I say, in my judgment, there is too much hysteria and people are unreasonably scared to death. We over on this side of the aisle have not convinced you on the other side of anything, and you on your side have not convinced us of anything different from our original political philosophies and yet we have been doing a lot of talking, each trying to convince the other for a long time, and both meeting with failure in that effort.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I came here today pretty well prepared to be in opposition to this bill. It does not have everything in it I think it should have, but I do think there is one very important safeguard. That, I believe, you will find on page 21, section 908, line 6. It says:

> The authority granted under this act, or under any provision thereof, shall terminate whenever such termination is directed by concurrent resolution of the two Houses of the Congress.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield.

Mr. MASON. It has never been done, and that is the answer to that.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the gentleman for that information, but this is my first term. I have a lot to learn.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that although I do not think this bill has everything that I would like to see in it, that it is worth a trial. I certainly hope that this will be the antidote for the insidious diseases and poisons spreading throughout the world. I hope we can sell the peoples of war-torn Europe and of the Far East on the idea that Americans are people who love peace and want peac and want to be friendly.

I just came out of a rough war. I do not like being shot at. I hope I do not have to be shot at again. I hope this bill will be a means of convincing the people of the other countries that we do not want to be shot at and that we do not want to shoot at them. We want to be friendly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma That is what I was trying to get at. That is what we had in 1938 and 1939 We did not want to shoot. We wanted to be friendly. We knew it but Germany did not know it. That is the whole thing I think you are going to build up under this exchange of students. We are going to sell the idea that we are peaceful, and everybody will find it out except Russia. We do not need to tell the people in America about it. We had better start talking about preparedness and not get into what we did in 1938 and 1939.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad the gentleman agrees with me. The gentleman said that Germany did not know how we felt about it in 1938 and 1939. I, too, believe we should have a strong national defense. I hope we do not have to use it. I hope this bill will provide ways and means of preventing us from using it—I am economy-minded. I have voted for economy ever since I have been here, but I am not going to be for economy if I have to be shot at again and if my buddies have to be shot at.

Mr. RAMEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield.

Mr. RAMEY. I wish to say that I agree with the gentleman from Indiana. I came here convinced that I would not support this bill, but after hearing the information given by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], I think I shall support it. There is one correction of a remark that I would like to have explained by the gentleman from Minnesota, Dr. JUDD, although he does not seem to be here right now. That is about the $5,000 appropriation for the WCTU. That was by unanimous consent, and it was an educational matter, dealing with opium and such as that.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the gentleman. I am glad to know that. I was concerned about that.

To continue, I hope this bill is passed. I intend to vote for it and I hope that my vote will be received all over the country in the spirit in which it is given.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MITCHELL] has expired.

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the required number of words and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARLESS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said concerning the personnel in the offices that are disseminating information from the Voice of America. It so happens that I attended college with some of the top men in that organization. I have before me a letter from the wife of one of the top men in Voice of America, who also attended college with me. I know the writer of this letter and her husband well, because they were personal friends of mine. I want to read some excerpts from this letter. I am particularly interested in the fact that our distinguished colleague from Illinois [Mr. BUSBEY] has changed his ideas since meeting in New York with the top men of the Voice of America. Mr. Delgado, the husband of the party who wrote this letter, was one of the men he visited. These excerpts from this letter from Catherine Morgan Delgado are very interesting. She is the daughter of a former Supreme Court Justice of my State. Mr. Delgado, in my estimation, is one of the most intelligent young men I have ever had the privilege of meeting.

This letter says:

> Several weeks ago Congressman BUSBEY visited the New York office of the State Department's radio branch, met three men who are largely responsible for what goes on the air from the United States. One was my husband, Mucio Delgado, still a constituent of yours (and still a Knight of Columbus from Arizona)—

I may say parenthetically he is a very ardent Catholic—> who is chief of the Broadcast Division; a second was John Sheehan, head of the New York office, a very devout Irish Catholic who has been known to frown at anyone reading a copy of PM; the third was Mr. Thayer of the Russian desk, a relative of the Cabots and Lodges of Massachusetts, long a United States Foreign Service officer, who during the war served with the Army's OSS.

> Those who cry for sifting out Communists and other subversives seem to forget that the FBI has been screening these Civil Service people for years. In an operation conducted in 26 languages to reach 67 countries it is naturally impossible to fill out a staff completely with citizen personnel sufficiently familiar with local dialects and backgrounds to be effective. Even so, of the 522 radio staff members here more than 200 are World War II veterans and a large proportion of the rest are United States citizens whose loyalties cannot be questioned.

I want you to listen to this particular part because I think it is very important. The writer says:

> Incidentally, when you hear bluster about inefficiency and waste, remember that 522 people are putting out in 26 languages at least three times as many broadcast-hours as any domestic commercial network. This compares to NBC's roster of 10,000 employees in New York.
> As a radio widow who knows only too well that long hours often make up for what some informed believers have termed a ridiculously inadequate set-up, I resent that sort of unfair Americanism and criticism.

I happen to know these people. When we come here and bluster and bandy words about without knowing what we are saying I think is is most unfair. We have heard a great deal of talk here today and we have had crepe draped around some of the war heroes and the Gold Star mothers, but if any of you are willing to carry the responsibility for a third world war and the death of your sons and grandsons you just vote against this program today. You must not do it for the simple reason that we cannot afford to fight a war and have our sons die on foreign soil, spend our money to win a war and then go silently home and let the rest of the world tell of their activities while we die at the roots.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I was sitting in the rear row just a few minutes ago with four chairmen of the subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations. I heard these gentlemen remarking about the difficult time they were having reducing expenses, cutting costs. I can readily appreciate their dilemma because I too am a Republican and I promised along with other Republicans that we would cut the cost of government to the bone.

I recall as a member of the Committee on Public Works that we had a meeting early in the session and we had a sort of gentleman's agreement that we would not submit any new projects, that we would not approve any new projects during this session of Congress. In my own county of Cuyahoga in which the city of Cleveland is situated, there is a river, the Cuyahoga River.

In 1946 the War Department recommended certain improvements at the port of Cleveland. These are shown in House Document No. 629, Seventy-ninth Congress, second session. Among the recommendations made by the Government was that six railroad bridges that are a menace or hinderance to navigation be replaced with new bridges and that one bridge be rebuilt.

The total cost of these improvements is estimated by the Army engineers at $13,236,800, of which the Federal Government would spend $10,927,400 and the railroads $2,309,400.

Until such time as these bridges are replaced, plant owners along the Cuyahoga River are unwilling to set aside money for plant improvements because they are unable to move the larger type of Lakes boats along the river because of the narrowness of the bridge openings.

It is especially important at this time that funds be provided to replace bridges Nos. 25, 8, 9, and 1. These four bridges would cost $8,800,000, of which the Federal Government's share would be $6,975,500 and the railroad's $1,824,500.

First on the above list is bridge No. 25, owned by the Wheeling and Lake Erie Railroad. This is one of the oldest bridges in the inner harbor and the opening is very narrow with the result that boats move through the draw with great caution and this bridge is an extreme hazard to navigation.

Two large steel plants are located above this bridge on the deep-water channel, one of which is the property of the Defense Plant Corporation, and is leased to the Republic Steel Corp., and the other is owned and operated by the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp.

If the Government makes an appropriation for the above bridges, construction will start almost immediately as the railroads are advancing funds for the preparation of plans and are ready to pay their share of the cost of the bridges.

In the rebuilding program for America and the world, steel and steel products in unlimited supply are necessary, and when these old railroad bridges are replaced the steel companies located in the Cuyahoga Valley will be able to increase their production.

This and many other worthy projects are being sidetracked in the name of economy.

We voted in this Chamber to reduce President Truman's budget by $6,000,000,000. Now I am informed that we will be lucky if we reduce it by $4,000,000,000, or possibly $3,000,000,000. For the life of me I cannot understand my Republican friends when they are willing to spend $31,000,000—this item has been upped from nineteen to thirty-one million dollars—to tell the people of the world how wonderful we are. We appropriate money to continue governments that the common people of those countries do not want. Do you think the people of Greece want the present Greek Government? Do you think if the people of Russia had a chance to get rid of some of their leaders they would not jump at the chance? Do you think in Czechoslovakia and in Poland they like the kind of government we helped to put over on them? Do you think those people love us in America for permitting a Soviet regime to rule in many of these countries? Now we anoint their heads with oil, we supply them with money, and we are going to spend $31,000,000 to tell the people how wonderful we are. The natives do not think their governments are wonderful. If they had anything to do with it they would come over here. They would get out of those places. They do not need to be educated about the United States of America. They love our country. They would like to come over here, and you know it. But they do not appreciate our keeping corrupt rulers in power with our money.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Is there not a bill in the Judiciary Committee by which 400,000 of them are trying to get over here?

Mr. BENDER. Yes. There are many who have come in here illegally now trying to stay here. How in the world are we going to be consistent Republicans and reduce expenses if we vote for all these boondoggling projects?

You do not need $31,000,000 to tell the people of the world about the United States. If they have not learned up to this time, with an expenditure of $300,000,000,000 in the last war, they never will learn. The United States of America is not asking the world for a thing.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Have we not left a black trail all across Europe, especially in England.

Mr. BENDER. Someone said that England is spending $50,000,000 for propaganda. Sure. It is our money they are spending in England. Is it not true we provided the money for them? We are perpetuating a Socialist government over there, a government that is far out of line with what we have here in the United States of America.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENDER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. And they are negotiating a loan with Russia which will certainly come out of the $3,750,000,000 we loaned Britain.

Mr. BENDER. The gentleman never made a truer statement in his life.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the Jackson Day dinner was held last night in Los Angeles, Calif., to an enthusiastic crowd of over 1,300 Democratic Party leaders. The scheduled national speakers were John W. Snyder, Secretary of the Treasury, and Gael Sullivan, acting chairman of the Democratic Party, and Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt.

The national committeeman of California, Edwin W. Pauley, used his influence to cancel the appearance of Mr. Snyder and Mr. Sullivan a few hours before the banquet hour. It was therefore too late to secure national speakers to take their place. The excuse given by Mr. Pauley, was that he disapproved of a tentative draft of policy of the State Democratic committee which mildly criticized the Truman doctrine. The draft of policy had no connection with the Jackson Day dinner. The recent speeches of Mr. Henry Wallace in California have given rise to the rumor of a Wallace slate of delegates in 1948. There will undoubtedly be a Pauley slate for Mr. Truman. By the stupid political action of Mr. Pauley, Mr. Snyder and Mr. Sullivan in gratuitously insulting the official State Democratic Party organization, James Roosevelt, the chairman of the Democratic State Central Committee of California, and the third speaker of the evening, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, there will now undoubtedly be a third slate of delegates headed by a Roosevelt, a name very potent in California.

Such a development would no doubt, put California in the Republican column in the presidential election of 1948. If it occurs, the Republicans can thank Edwin W. Pauley, the man whose nomination for Under Secretary of the Navy was rejected by the other body of the United States Congress.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I thought for a few minutes that the gentleman from California was giving a Voice of America broadcast. It sounded like some of the broadcasts that I heard from the Voice of America in Europe after the war was over. Those broadcasts made me blush with shame. The broadcasts I heard in Europe were not the voice of America but the voice of the radical left-wing New Deal of this country. I am sure the Jeffersonian Democrats in this House would have blushed with shame and denied they represented the true America.

I came over to the House this afternoon expecting to support this bill. I believe in selling America to the world. I have had some bit of experience, as some of you have, in traveling around most countries of the world. I had one experience that I wish to tell you about down to South America. I took a trip on a Norwegian freighter. No one could speak English but the captain. There were only a few of us on the boat. On that Norwegian freighter there was a short-wave radio set. What do you think we got in the way of broadcast? Broadcasts from Italy, Germany, and from those broadcasts they put out a little news about America. I was shocked about the news from the United States, because some of those broadcasts made me feel that the people in Detroit and Chicago were starving to death. The broadcaster mentioned a murder in the United States. Why, you would have thought that half of the town was in a riot. It was such a poor picture of America. And, I felt all along that the Congress, that our State Department, or that someone ought to be selling the true facts of America to the world.

But, in looking at this bill presented by the committee, you find not a bill to beam radio program to other countries, but a bill so wide and open to include bringing an unlimited number of aliens to our already overcrowded schools. This will crowd out many a worthy GI. It is not a Voice of America broadcast bill. It covers the whole field of information, transfer of funds, official entertainment, with our citizens paying the bill.

Let me point out some other features of the bill. The purposes of the bill in the report seem to be all right; I cannot quarrel with them, but let us explore the bill. Here are some of the things it will do.

On page 3, line 9, there is a provision for some foreign guest instructors to help sell America.

I find on page 6, line 4, and again on page 13, lines 16 and 17, some references to official entertainment. Now, is that part of the Voice of America? I think that this representation, as has been pointed out, is liquid refreshments of some kind. I just cannot go along and say to the farmers and the folks in my district that "We are going to tax you to help furnish liquor and drinks and other forms of entertainment to a lot of foreign guests of this country." I also feel this, that the committee should keep in mind that the universities of this country are lined up and crowded with American GI's that want to go to school, and in this bill we bring in an unlimited number of foreigners to crowd out the veteran. It should be pointed out that we are already bringing in thousands of students and they just do not go back. They come in under the nonquota provision of our immigration laws.

Then I find, on page 15, that they pay for travel, conventions, and social activities, yes, pay $10 per diem to make them welcome. The bill carries no limit on the amount of money to be so spent.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. While you are paying your veterans something like $200, you are going to pay these folks their travel expenses and $300 a month.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. It just does not make sense to me.

On page 5, lines 1 and 2, it says these aliens are going to help teach English here. Perhaps they will add to the ever-increasing rolls of ism teachers in our schools.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. JENNINGS. Does the gentleman think as a physician that, after we have drenched England, France, Italy, Russia, and all those other countries with our benefactions and our goodness, using a hypodermic needle on them now to the extent of $31,000,000 will do any good?

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. This country is not on very good terms with the rest of the world. You cannot buy friendship; my experience in traveling the world over tells me that few countries like us. Bonds from all South American countries were, with one exception, defaulted after World War I.

It appears in this bill that the same old crowd of OWI will run the program. We best let this group go out of existence and start anew. I will support a real radio selling program to the world, but not the voice of radical left-wingers that are now in control. This bill is too broad and not in the interests of America.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words.

Mr. Chairman, like the gentleman who just preceded me, I came here with the thought of supporting a reasonable bill—something which might involve some moderate expenditure for the Voice of America. I am literally astounded by reading this bill. It seems to me to have no limits outside of heaven for practically anything one wants to do. The provisions of it are broad, and deep, and wide, and they cover practically the entire world.

Let us take a few items very quickly. Take section 201. There is no limit to the number of people who could be taken into the country or sent out of the country under these provisions. Is it 10, or 10,000, or 100,000? I have no idea. Everything is left up to the Committee on Appropriations. Has the Committee on Appropriations become the legislative body of the House of Representatives? According to this bill, I think it would be.

Take section 202, which provides for publications, books, periodicals, and so forth. No limit again. Go the limit. Nobody seems to care.

Take section 203. We go into the question of providing for education and assistance to schools. At the present time we have people in this country begging for assistance in education. The schools of Arkansas, the schools of Texas, and the schools of many States need educational help, and we cannot give them a thin dime, but we can come out here and say, "Spend what you want on education abroad, whatever the Appropriations Committee will give you."

Go over to the next page, section 301. You can assign anybody you want to any purpose, in any number, except you cannot assign the Army and the Navy to help the Army and the Navy of some other country.

Let us go to the next page, section 303. We even go to the limit of allowing Government personnel to accept office under foreign countries. Will we let them take the oath of allegiance to those countries? Nothing here says they cannot. Are we going to send a man from here and say he can take the oath of allegiance to that country and then be loyal to our own? I find not a word that says you cannot.

Let us take one more item and then quit. We go over to training in section 404. In this we not only provide that all the boys can go, or all the boys can come, but we say that the United States is authorized to give training and orientation courses for the boys that come and the boys that go. I do not know how anything could be written broader, or anything could be written for which more money could be spent, or how this House could waive its authority any more than it does if it passes this bill.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHURCH. The gentleman referred to section 201 as though there was a limitation, depending on the appropriations. No; it does not depend on the appropriations. There is no limitation whatever in line 9, page 3, dealing with students, trainees, teachers, guest instructors, and professors. Only the Secretary is authorized to provide for interchanges between the United States and other countries. It does not depend upon appropriations.

Mr. BRADLEY. I thank the gentleman for his observation. I simply remove the previous qualification and say there is no limit. I hope the bill will be recommitted for revision.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, this bill may be in need of amendment as has been suggested. If so, I am happy to see amendments offered and will work in certain cases for their approval. In general, I approve of the intent and purpose of the bill.

Most of the discussion we have heard today has been criticism of the personnel who produce the Voice of America. It has been said that many persons connected with OWI have been retained and are still connected with this work. I do not have first hand knowledge but I cannot concur in the criticism either of the OWI or its successor, VOA. I have known some of the young men connected with this splendid work and I know of their fine intelligence, good Americanism and intense loyalty, therefore I would stake my life that their part of this great work has been well done. While I am on the matter of high quality and competency as well as deep loyalty and patriotism, I would like to express my entire confidence, not only in the young men referred to but in Mr. Benton, now at the head of the agency. But I should like to say a word now concerning the provisions for exchange of instructors and students with other nations.

Having been a college instructor I have had some experience which bears somewhat on this matter. I have not been a student in foreign lands but I have had instructors from abroad and I think I can properly evaluate them. As an instructor I have had foreign students and whether I did them any good or not I know what impressions they made on me, and that is what I would like to suggest very briefly.

One of the most effective instructors that I ever had through my school career was a Nordic whose English I could follow with difficulty but whose scientific instruction made a deep impression upon me. He had degrees from several universities in northwestern Europe and he gave me information and impressions of the peoples and institutions of Norway, Denmark, and Sweden which were virtually equivalent to college studies there.

I did have an exchange professor from Germany at a period between the two World Wars, and of all things, he taught the danger-charged subject of economics. It was at a time when Germany was giving birth to nazism and he was a choice product of a German university. Was he a dangerous subversive? And did he delude me and pollute my mind and that of other students? He did not. I have often thought of that man and wondered about him. If he went back to Germany or was in Germany at the time when Hitler came to power, I know he would have been the first to have been thrown into a concentration camp, for all of his teachings were exactly the reverse of what the Hitler philosophy embodied. If Germany had had more men like him, Hitler would never have been more than a paper hanger.

As an instructor have I had foreign students? Yes, several interesting ones. One of these foreigners was a mature man, a brilliant fellow, a Russian, directly from the land of the former Czars. Ah, was he a Nihilist? Or a Bolshevik? Did he carry bombs? No, he had a great deal of spirit but not of the kind you might suppose. He was a White Russian, a Greek Catholic priest and he had seen members of his own family cut down by the Reds, and had barely escaped across Siberia with his life. He is the only person of Russian blood I have ever known, and I learned more from him than he learned from me. I would be glad to admit students from Russia like him.

Have I had orientals as students? Yes; Chinese, Japanese, and turbaned Hindus. Those orientals disquieted and embarrassed me by their earnestness and eagerness to learn. One illustration will suffice.

In an educational lecture before a class containing one of these Hindu students I mentioned a little book entitled "Leonard and Gertrude" while discussing Pestalozzi and other educational reformers. Imagine my pleased surprise that evening in the university library, while most of the members of that group were probably attending social functions, to find that Hindu student poring over the little book by Pestalozzi. As I passed him I casually inquired, "Do you find that interesting?" Said he, with great earnestness, "I must translate this into the language of my people." In a lengthy conversation with him I discovered his reason for that determination.

Has America had any successful experience in the matter of exchange of students? Several years ago the University of Arizona for a considerable period regularly exchanged students with the University of Mexico. I am convinced that that cultural exchange has had an important influence upon the friendly relations of our two countries. No one will deny that the presence of so many Chinese students in American schools, supported by the Boxer fund, have improved their knowledge of and their attitude toward the United States. If time permitted, I could tell of further improvements in American-Chinese relationship by the labors of high-class instructors in such Chinese universities as at Nanking. I am convinced further that only through the exchange of information and cultural appreciation with the other important peoples of the world can we make ourselves a little more secure in this dangerous situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OBJECTIVES

SEC. 2. The Congress hereby declares that the objectives of this act are to enable the Government of the United States to correct misunderstandings about the United States in other countries, which constitute obstacles to peace, and to promote mutual understanding between the people of the United States and other countries, which is one of the essential foundations of peace, by means of—

(1) the interchange of persons, knowledge, and skills;

(2) the rendering of technical and other services to other countries on the basis of mutual cooperation; and

(3) the dissemination abroad of public information about the United States, its people, and the principles and objectives of its Government.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 4, strike out the words "correct misunderstandings about the United States in other countries, which constitute obstacles to peace, and to."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JENKINS of Ohio, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3342) to enable the Government of the United States more effectively to carry on its foreign relations by means of promotion of the interchange of persons, knowledge, and skills between the people of the United States and other countries, and by means of public dissemination abroad of information about the United States, its people, and its policies, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEWIS DESCHLER, PARLIAMENTARIAN OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, tonight National University will honor itself by honoring our distinguished Parliamentarian. No man in the history of law has ever been more worthy of the degree of doctor of laws than Lew Deschler, once a son of Ohio but now grown too great in our esteem to be claimed by any State—he is now the property of the Nation, and peculiarly the property of the House of Representatives which he has served so faithfully, so fairly, and with such ability as to earn all the honors which could be heaped upon him.

I know that those of you who are not privileged to know this honor that is coming to that great institution in this great city of ours will wish to know that our own beloved Lew Deschler is to be crowned king of lawyers by this institution tonight in his own right.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DIRKSEN asked and was given permission to revise and extend the remarks he made today and to include the text of an amendment he proposes to offer to the bill.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

MESSAGES FROM THE SENATE AND SIGNING ENROLLED BILLS

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, notwithstanding the adjournment of the House, the Clerk of the House be authorized to receive messages from the Senate and that the Speaker be authorized to sign any enrolled bills or joint resolutions duly passed by both Houses and found truly enrolled.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for this time in order to announce the program for next week.

On Monday and Tuesday we will take up first matters from the Committee on the District of Columbia, including, as I understand it, the tax bill. Also House Concurrent Resolution 49, which is an adverse report on Reorganization Plan No. 2.

Then the unfinished business, of course, will be the further consideration of H. R. 3342, which has been before the House today.

We had scheduled for this week H. R. 3492, having to do with the disposition of war housing. Not having been able to dispose of that this week, that will come on, I trust, on Tuesday, for consideration.

On Wednesday it is expected that the Government corporations appropriation bill will be ready for consideration and it will probably continue through Thursday.

On Friday we hope to have ready for consideration the legislative appropriation bill and also a deficiency appropriation bill.

Of course, conference reports may be called up at any time; and also any rules or matters that are urgent may be called up if time permits.

Mr. RAMEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield.

Mr. RAMEY. There will be a definite commitment with reference to Saturday, the 14th, Flag Day? There will be no session on that day, 1 week from tomorrow, will there?

Mr. HALLECK. I cannot say about that. We are running into short time on many of the appropriation bills. I am hopeful that we may consider them expeditiously and bring them to passage at as early a time as possible. I cannot say about a week from tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

PRESIDENT'S REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 2 OF 1947 NECESSARY TO CARRY OUT OBJECTIVE OF PUBLIC EMPLOYMENT OFFICE SYSTEM

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time to speak on the subject of the President's Reorganization Plan No. 2, which, we are told, will come to the floor next Tuesday. It is rare in legislative procedures for very simple issues to be so distorted and confused as they have been in connection with the consideration of the President's Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1947. Obscured in the testimony presented before the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments are a few sound, simple facts upon which the President's reorganization plan rests. Briefly, these facts are:

First. The Wagner-Peyser Act of June 6, 1933, established the United States Employment Service Bureau in the Department of Labor.

Second. The failure of the States to make adequate provision for taking claims of unemployed workers in 1938 resulted in the diversion of the facilities of the United States Employment Service to claims taking activities and the financing of the Employment Service facilities out of funds appropriated under title III of the Social Security Act.

Third. The inadequacy of our Nation-wide system of public-employment offices for dealing with the war-emergency problems led to its federalization and subsequent transfer to the War Manpower Commission.

Fourth. With the liquidation of the War Manpower Commission, the United States Employment Service was returned to the United States Department of Labor in order that it could be in an agency of Cabinet status and where its functions could be coordinated with closely related activities in the field of labor.

Fifth. In the Department of Labor, the United States Employment Service has operated efficiently.

Sixth. During the period when the United States Employment Service was in the Federal Security Agency, the finding of jobs for workers was subordinated to the function of paying them benefits.

Seventh. In the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, the Congress provided that the Federal agency administering the United States Employment Service shall maintain that Service as an operating entity.

Eighth. The President's reorganization plan assures that administration of the United States Employment Service as an operating entity and protects it against again becoming subordinated to the negative program of paying benefits instead of finding jobs for unemployed workers.

UNITED STATES EMPLOYMENT SERVICE

When State unemployment compensation benefit payments began in 1938, the facilities of the public employment offices, which had been established under the Wagner-Peyser Act in 1933, were expanded so that these offices could apply the work test for the State unemployment compensation authorities. To finance the speedy expansion of Employment Service facilities, funds were granted to the States under title III of the Social Security Act which authorized the payment of administrative costs of the State unemployment compensation programs.

Because of the failure of the States to make adequate provision for taking claims of unemployed workers, the facilities of the United States Employment Service were commandeered for this purpose. Employment Service facilities were diverted away from their original purpose of finding jobs for workers to taking claims. This diversion of facilities together with the emergency method of financing the expansion of the Service led to the transfer of the United States Employment Service to the Social Security Board in the newly established Federal Security Administration in 1939.

The defense program revealed glaring inadequacy in our Nation-wide system of public employment offices for dealing with the problems then emerging and the system was placed under Federal operation in January 1942. Later the same year, the United States Employment Service was transferred to the War Manpower Commission to which responsibility for the recruitment of our civilian manpower had been assigned. Here its activities were rapidly expanded and it acted as the main operating arm of that agency until after VJ-day.

With the imminent liquidation of the War Manpower Commission in 1945, it was necessary for the President to carefully review the situation and determine whether the United States Employment Service should be returned to the Federal Security Agency. After analyzing all alternatives the President recognized that the United States Employment Service program had fared poorly during the period when it had been integrated with unemployment compensation in the Federal Security Administration. We also recognized that the United States Employment Service program was more closely related to the functions of the Department of Labor than to the functions carried on by the Federal Security Administration. The Employment Service was, therefore, returned, by Executive Order 9617, to the Department of Labor where it had originally been placed by Congress. It continued as a federally operated program in the Department of Labor until November 16, 1946, when the administration of the State and local offices was transferred back to the States in accordance with the Labor-Federal Security Agency Appropriation Act for 1947.

The successful experience of the United States Employment Service since its return to the Department of Labor in 1945, where Congress had originally placed it, substantiates the President's conclusion that its continued effective operation depends upon its remaining permanently in that Department.

The President's plan is further supported by congressional action which established the Department of Labor. Congress stated that—

> The purpose of the Department of Labor shall be to foster, promote, and develop the welfare of the wage earners in the United States, to improve their working conditions, and to advance workers' opportunities for profitable employment.

It should be perfectly apparent to everyone that the Department of Labor cannot effectively carry out its statutory obligation to advance workers' opportunities for profitable employment without some responsibility for the only Nation-wide agency established specifically to advance workers' opportunities for profitable employment.

Incidentally, the President's action was earlier endorsed by the Republican Party in its platform of 1944, which states:

> The Department of Labor has been emasculated by the New Deal. Labor bureaus, agencies, and committees are scattered far and wide, in Washington and throughout the country, and have no semblance of systematic or responsible organization. All governmental labor activities must be placed under the direct authority and responsibility of the Secretary of Labor.

An analysis of the activities of the Department of Labor reveals that there is an important working relationship between the Employment Service and every operating division in the Department of Labor—the Wage and Hour Division, Apprentice Training, Conciliation Service, and other divisions concerned with fostering, promoting, and developing the welfare of the wage earners of the United States.

Since the return of the United States Employment Service to the Department of Labor it has grown in vigor and effectiveness. In 1946 the public employment offices handled one of the largest work loads in all peacetime history. Reconversion employment problems were handled promptly and efficiently. A well-balanced program was introduced throughout the Nation, and this program, together with the State and local office facilities, were transferred to State administration with scarcely any interruption in the service. Federal-State relations were established on a sounder basis than ever before.

The contribution of the public Employment Service has been reflected in the economic well-being of this country. In 1946 the number of calls made at public employment offices for job placements, job information, job counseling, and other related services totaled 134,600,000; an average of 11,200,000 calls for each month. The number of job applications during the same period amounted to 10,400,000; an average of 864,500 each month. Employment counseling interviews totaled 1,362,000; an average of 113,500 per month. Job referrals averaged 1,059,000. Employer service calls totaled 1,723,000; an average of 143,600 per month.

Services to veterans during 1946 represented a substantial part of the total activities. For example, 5,640,000 job applications were from veterans. Employment-counseling interviews to veterans amounted to 1,015,000. There were 4,508,000 local job referrals of veterans.

The number of handicapped job seekers totaled 643,000 during 1946, with approximately 429,000 disabled veterans in this group. Employment-counseling activities to the handicapped expanded markedly during 1946 and totaled 209,000 initial interviews for the period. Job-placement activities also increased, and a total of 214,000 local placements of handicapped workers were made during the year. Approximately 138,500, or 65 percent of all job placements for handicapped workers, were disabled veterans.

The public employment offices made 7,140,000 job placements during the year, of which approximately 5,519,000 were made in nonagricultural employment; of these about 2,033,000 were veterans.

The placement activities of the public employment offices extend to all types of employment. For example, more than 40.2 percent of the placements are made in manufacturing industries; another 15.5 percent in trade; about 11.5 percent in construction; and the remaining placements are distributed in service, household, and other employments.

It is estimated that the placements made in manufacturing constituted more than 20 percent of the total workers hired, in contrast with approximately 10 to 13 percent when the United States Employment Service was in the Federal Security Administration.

WORK TEST

The fact that the local offices of the public employment service apply the work test for the State unemployment compensation authorities had led to widespread misunderstanding and to the erroneous conclusion that the main purpose of the public employment offices is to facilitate the taking of claims and payment of benefits; in other words, that the tail does and should wag the dog. The work test requires that a prospective claimant for unemployment compensation benefits register with the local employment office to see if the office has a job opening for which he is qualified. If such a job exists the employment office refers the worker, and if he is found to be satisfactory by the employer and accepts the job, the unemployment compensation authorities are in no way involved. If the worker refuses the employment, the facts are reported to the unemployment compensation authorities for such action as they deem appropriate in connection with the worker's claim for benefits. If no job is available, it is necessary for the claimant to report at regular intervals to the employment office as evidence that he has not obtained employment or has not left the labor market; in short, that he is able and willing to work.

Upon the sands of this simple functional relationship between the two programs has been built labyrinthian arguments that the United States Employment Service must now be ripped from its moorings—its working relationships with other bureaus promoting the welfare of the wage earner severed—and transferred to the agency concerned with education, public health, cancer control, public assistance, infant and child care, food and drug administration, and similar programs.

SUBORDINATION OF EMPLOYMENT SERVICE TO UNEMPLOYMENT-COMPENSATION FUNCTIONS

The testimony presented makes it abundantly clear that the Employment Service program was completely subordinated to the unemployment-compensation functions from shortly after the time the Social Security Board encouraged the States with model draft legislation until the emergency federalization of the Service in 1942. Yet the opponents of the President's Reorganization Plan No. 2, with protesting piety, now declare that they, too, recognize that the public employment-office activities—the aggressive development of job opportunities and placement of unemployed workers—should take precedence over the payment of benefits to unemployed workers. The fact remains, however, tha. so long as the two programs were under the direction of the Federal Security Agency emphasis was placed inescapably upon the prompt payment of benefits, and Employment Service staff was diverted to claims-taking activities. The finding of employment opportunities for workers was neglected.

It is interesting to note in this connection that the president of the Interstate Conference of Employment Security Administrators attempts to dismiss these facts by saying that at the time most States began paying benefits in 1938, we were in the midst of a recession. He further asserts that if the same conditions were to arise again, the same sort of neglect of finding employment opportunities for unemployed workers would occur. According to the witness, "There were no jobs and all we used our personnel for was to line them"—unemployed workers—"up. There were no jobs to refer them to."

The facts are that in 1938, the year to which the witness refers, over 4,000,000 workers found employment in manufacturing activities alone, and manufacturing at the time engaged only about 20 percent of our working population. What happened was that workers found employment through their own unaided efforts when employment-office facilities were being used for lining up unemployed workers so that they could be given not jobs but benefits.

One of the primary responsibilities of the public employment office is to facilitate the employment of workers by providing a central point in each community where workers may ascertain the existence of job openings and employers the existence of available workers to cut down the loss of time between jobs. The conclusion that the Employment Service personnel should be used for lining up unemployed workers for claims payment, instead of lining up jobs for such workers reflects either a gross misunderstanding of the purpose of a public-employment-office system or a callous indifference to the welfare of our working population.

It should be apparent to everyone, as was pointed out by the Under Secretary of Labor in his testimony before the Committee that where you have an integration of the functions of the unemployment compensation and employment service with an interchangeablity of staff, the payment of benefits inevitably takes precedence over the searching out of suitable jobs for unemployed workers.

So persistent is the propensity to subordinate the public-employment-service functions to those of paying unemployment-compensation benefits that Congress has had to take cognizance of the fact in the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944. In section 604 of that act, Congress provides that, "The Federal agency administering the United States Employment Service shall maintain that service as an operating entity."

Congress has decided that this provision is necessary to assure, as far as veterans are concerned, that no administrative reorganization shall be permitted to divert the efforts of the public employment service from providing effective employment assistance and job counseling to veterans. Congress, in fact, has guarded against a repetition of past mistakes by rescinding that portion of the President's Reorganization Plan No. 1, of 1939, which unfortunately consolidated the functions of the United States Employment Service with those of the unemployment-compensation program. This mistake was not rectified until the federalization of the system in 1942.

BUDGETS, ACCOUNTING, AND EXPENDITURES PROCEDURES

In some of the testimony presented before the committee, an attempt was made to tie the functions of the unemployment compensation and employment service programs together on the basis of their budget, accounting, and expenditure procedures. The cost of administration of both programs in the States is financed 100 percent by the Federal Government, and on the basis of the testimony, one might come to the erroneous conclusion that if the unemployment compensation and employment service programs were brought together under a single direction in the Federal Administration that there would be no necessity for the States to account for funds they receive from the Federal Government.

Congress in fact makes three appropriations for three distinct programs administered by the State agencies. The State agencies administer, first, the public employment offices; second, State unemployment compensation system; and, third, Servicemen's Readjustment Allowances. In accordance with the purposes of the Wagner-Peyser Act, the Congress appropriates funds for the administration of public employment offices. It likewise appropriates funds, in accordance with title III of the Social Security Act for the administration of State unemployment compensation systems. Appropriations for the administration of Servicemen's Readjustment Allowances are made to the Veterans' Administration, and are granted to the States in accordance with budget requests prepared by the States for the purpose of administering the payment of Servicemen's Readjustment Allowances.

The States are permitted to commingle the funds appropriated for the three different programs in a single account. From these commingled funds they may finance temporary excess expenditures for any particular program. States cannot, however, permanently transfer funds appropriated by the Congress for one program and use those funds to finance another program.

Those who attempt to masquerade the points at issue by shrouding them in budget, accounting, and expenditure procedures forget that Congress is not ready to abdicate its responsibilities and to dish out funds with no accounting from the States for their expenditures for the specific purposes for which the funds have been appropriated. In other words, Congress is not willing to appropriate funds for one program and find these funds being transferred and used for the expansion of another program contrary to the wishes of Congress. Wherever the United States Employment Service might be located, it would be necessary for the States to itemize funds for the employment service program as distinct from other programs in order to obtain administrative grants which Congress appropriates for employment service purposes.

CONCERN OF STATE EMPLOYMENT SECURITY ADMINISTRATORS

Some of the members of the Interstate Conference of Employment Security Administrators testified that the Employment Service does not belong in the Department of Labor because that Department was established by Congress to promote the welfare of labor. They fail to explain, however, how the Department of Labor could carry out its obligations to advance opportunities for profitable employment for workers independently of the Employment Service activities. Interestingly enough, in approximately a third of the States both unemployment compensation and employment service administration is located in either the State department of labor or agencies dealing with labor matters. For example, both the unemployment compensation and employment service are located in the department of labor in New York, Wisconsin, Georgia, and Illinois, to mention only a few States. These departments have continuing relationships with the United States Department of Labor in connection with apprentice training, wages and hours administration, labor statistics, and similar matters affecting employment problems. All evidence indicates that the location of these programs in the departments of labor in the States in no way impairs the effectiveness of either program. As a matter of fact, the programs have been more effectively administered in the department of labor in some States than they have in an independent agency in others.

On the basis of the testimony a thoughtful person might ask why the State employment security administrators are so anxious to have the Federal agencies responsible for the employment-service program transferred to the Federal Security Agency where the unemployment compensation program is located. The answer is quite simple. The State employment security administrators have a sharp eye on their own personal interests.

The employment-security administrators are afraid that the pattern of organization recommended by the President for Unemployment Compensation and Employment Service might eventually be adopted by some of the States to the personal disadvantage of the administrators who now in most instances have control of both the unemployment compensation and employment service programs. While this possibility seems extremely remote, it is understandable that some State bureaucrats are likely to be apprehensive about any possible action that might adversely affect their bureaucratic interests. This apprehension has been repeatedly manifest in their opposition to strengthening the Veteran's Employment Service of the United States Employment Service.

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 2 FOR STRONG EMPLOYMENT SERVICE

There is one point concerning which there is unanimous agreement—that finding a man a job is far more important than the paying of unemployment benefits. The President's Reorganization Plan No. 2 seeks to support this principal by continuing the United States Employment Service in the Department of Labor where it will be protected against subordination to the unemployment compensation program.

On the basis of our review of the history, experience, and accomplishments of the public employment service in this country it is our firm conviction that the interest of this system will be best advanced by the continuance of the United States Employment Service in the Department of Labor in accordance with the President's plan.

The Chaplain, Rev. Peter Marshall, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Forgive us, O God, that we are so anxious, in all we say and do, to have the approval of men, forgetting that it is Thy approval that brings us peace of mind and clear conscience. Make us aware of the record Thou art writing—the record that one day will be read by the Judge of all the universe. We need to remember that there is no party in integrity, no politics in goodness. We pray for Thy grace and Thy help to do better and to be better.

Through Jesus Christ. Amen.

PROTEST AGAINST REDUCTION IN AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS FOR FARM OWNERSHIP OR PRODUCTION LOANS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have received an interesting letter from Harold Swanberg, president, Kansas Farmers' Union, St. Marys, Kans., remonstrating against any reduction in the agricultural appropriation bill for farm-ownership loans or production loans. I ask unanimous consent to have the letter printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the letter was received, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KANSAS FARMERS UNION,
St. Marys, Kans., June 7, 1947.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: I understand, under the agricultural appropriation bill, a substantial cut is to be made for the Farm Home Administration. Farm-ownership loans are being eliminated and production loans are being cut 40 percent.

I feel that Farm Home Administration is carrying on worth-while work, and is particularly helping the veteran and the young farmer get a start in farming. I know it is almost impossible for these young fellows to lease land mainly because with our equipment, established farmers can handle more land and are in position to purchase the land that is for sale. I feel that the Farm Home Administration is contributing much to the protection of the family-type farm. The Kansas Farmers Union does not like to see this cut that will be a detriment to the young farmer and veteran.

Sincerely,

HAROLD SWANBERG,
President.

UNIFICATION OF ARMED SERVICES—PETITION OF MEMBERS OF NEBRASKA LEGISLATURE

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present for appropriate reference, and to have printed in the RECORD with the signatures attached, a petition signed by 39 of the 43 members of the Nebraska Legislature, in connection with Senate bill 758, to provide unification of the armed services.

There being no objection, the petition was received, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD with the signatures attached, as follows:

To the Members of the Eightieth Congress of the United States of America:

The undersigned, members of the sixtieth session of the Legislature of the State of Nebraska, hereby petition the United States Congress to expedite action upon and favorably consider S. 758.

It is the belief of the undersigned that the proposed unification of the armed forces of the United States is in the interest of economy, efficiency, and the promotion of a more effective defensive plan for these United States. Such an organization of the armed forces is essential to the implementation of any defense plan capable of an adequate protection of our homelands.

AMENDMENT OF SOCIAL SECURITY ACT TO INCREASE CEILINGS ON EARNINGS OF RETIRED WORKERS AND WIDOWS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce for appropriate reference a bill to increase the ceilings on earnings of retired workers and widows, and I request that an explanatory statement prepared by me may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the explanatory statement will be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 1403) to amend the Social Security Act, as amended, introduced by Mr. WILEY, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The explanatory statement presented by Mr. WILEY was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTRODUCTION OF BILL TO INCREASE CEILINGS ON EARNINGS OF RETIRED WORKERS AND WIDOWS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I am introducing today a bill to amend the Social Security Act, which would increase the amount of money that may be earned by a retired worker or widow or dependent child while receiving social-security payments.

At the present time, if a man or woman over 65 years old is receiving an old-age pension, that pension ceases in any given month that the individual earns more than $14.99 from outside wages. That sum of outside earnings is obviously a tragic pittance in these days when high prices and inflationary conditions, brought about by under production, have rendered such small sums almost meaningless. The same condition is currently true in the case of widows and dependent youngsters whose survivors' insurance aid also ceases in any given month when the earnings are in excess of $14.99.

The purpose of my amendment, therefore, is to raise the ceiling from $14.99 to $25. This has been recommended in the past by the United States Social Security Board, which suggested a $25 or $30 a month ceiling.

In other words, under my amendment, a widow could be working on the outside and could make up to $25 a month from her private employment and still get her widow's aid. It may be suggested that this is still a terribly low limit on ceilings. Nevertheless, my suggestion corresponds with that of the Social Security Board, which has given extensive consideration to the matter. We are presented here with a problem that we cannot allow too large a sum in outside earnings for obvious reasons. At the same time, we seek to encourage supplementing of widows' and retired workers' sums in these inflationary times so that they can maintain themselves in reasonable comfort.

By my amendment I do not mean to even imply that by this slight change in our law we are in any way solving our grave social-security problem. I have previously introduced Senate Concurrent Resolution 13, for the purpose of establishing a Joint Social Security Committee, which would reevaluate the whole subject of social-security aid. It is obvious in these times that the whole subject of aid to the aged, to the blind, to the needy, to widows, to dependent children must be restudied, with the public interest in mind.

I believe that there is a very clear and obvious responsibility of the Federal Government to these folks to help assure them their security. We want to encourage qualities of industry and diligence rather than the qualities of sitting back and waiting for money from the Federal Government.

From my contacts with the Social Security Board I do not believe that my amendment would involve any great expense to the Federal Government. It would be very difficult to get an exact estimate of how much money this would cost Uncle Sam. That would depend entirely upon the business conditions in the country, whether employment opportunities were abundant or were scarce.

However, I believe that the Eightieth Congress should take action along this line as a beginning, albeit a small one, toward the end of adequate security.

MINIMUM-WAGE RATES

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS], the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] I ask unanimous consent to introduce for appropriate reference a bill to raise the minimum-wage standards of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. I request that the bill be printed in the body of the RECORD, together with an explanatory statement of the content and purpose of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be received, and appropriately referred, and, without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD, together with the explanatory statement.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 1404) to raise the minimum wage standards of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, introduced by Mr. PEPPER (for himself, Mr. WAGNER, Mr. THOMAS of Utah, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. GREEN, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. MYERS, Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. LANGER, and Mr. MORSE), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subparagraphs (1) through (4) of subsection (a) of section 6 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 are amended to read as follows:

"(1) during the first year from the effective date of this act not less than 65 cents an hour.

"(2) during the second year from such, date, not less than 70 cents an hour.

"(3) after the expiration of 2 years from such date, not less than 75 cents an hour.

"(4) in the case of employees in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, not less than the rate (not in excess of the applicable rate under subparagraphs (1), (2), or (3) of this section) prescribed in the applicable order of the Administrator issued under section 8."

SEC. 2. Subsection (b) of section 6 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. Subsections (a) and (c) of section 8 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 are amended by substituting for the words "40 cents an hour" wherever they occur the words "the applicable rate under subparagraph 1, 2, or 3 of subsection (a) of section 6."

SEC. 4. This act shall become effective upon expiration of 120 days from the date of its enactment.

The explanatory statement presented by Mr. PEPPER was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ELEVEN SENATORS URGE CONGRESS TO SET A DECENT MINIMUM WAGE FOR INDUSTRIAL WORKERS

Senators CLAUDE PEPPER, Democrat, Florida; ROBERT F. WAGNER, Democrat, New York; ELBERT D. THOMAS, Democrat, Utah; JAMES E. MURRAY, Democrat, Montana; DENNIS CHAVEZ, Democrat, New Mexico; THEODORE F. GREEN, Democrat, Rhode Island; WARREN G. MAGNUSON, Democrat, Washington; FRANCIS J. MYERS, Democrat, Pennsylvania; GLEN H. TAYLOR, Democrat, Idaho; WILLIAM LANGER, Republican, North Dakota; and WAYNE MORSE, Republican, Oregon, will introduce in the Senate today a bill to raise the minimum wage of industrial workers in interstate commerce from 40 cents an hour immediately to 65 cents, to 70 cents at the end of 1 year, and 75 cents at the end of 2 years. Companion bills will be introduced in the House of Representatives at the same time by Congressman JOHN W. MCCORMACK, Democrat, Massachusetts, and RAY MADDEN, Democrat, Indiana.

This bill carries out the suggestion of President Truman that the minimum wage under the Fair Labor Standards Act be raised to at least 65 cents an hour when he signed the portal-to-portal pay bill on May 14.

It is high time that our Congress paid heed to the needs of the common people of this country. There has been no increase in legal minimum wage since the law was passed in 1938. Since 1938 the cost of living has risen over 55 percent.

The sponsors of this bill recognize the possible impact upon many businesses of a sudden sharp raise in the minimum wage from 40 cents to 75 cents immediately, and have, therefore, provided for a 2-year interval before the higher figure would become applicable.

In our opinion, the ultimate minimum wage of 75 cents under our bill would bring economically defenseless workers who are grossly underpaid a step closer to a decent minimum American standard of living. The rise in the cost of living alone justifies this increase. Seventy-five cents an hour would mean only $30 a week, or about $1,500 a year. The cost of living in representative cities in the various geographic regions of the country in 1946 was $2,265.27 for a family of four in Norfolk, Va.; $2,176.24 in New Orleans; $2,216.97 in Atlanta; $2,319.24 in Chicago; $2,422.68 in New York City; $2,284.83 in Pittsburgh; $2,379.25 in Washington, D. C.; and $2,170.32 in Los Angeles. It can be seen, therefore, that 75 cents an hour is a modest compromise with need.

In introducing this legislation we recall the pledge made by the chairman of the Senate Labor Committee, Senator TAFT, on March 21, 1947, during debate on the portal-to-portal bill, to the effect that his committee will take the matter of a higher minimum wage up at the earliest possible moment and give full consideration to amendments to the basic provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Since then, however, although minimum-wage legislation has been referred to a subcommittee, no hearings have been scheduled and no action appears to be pending. Meanwhile, the minimum wage remains at 40 cents an hour.

As the St. Louis Post-Dispatch observed editorially recently following the President's approval of the portal-to-portal bill and his request for a minimum wage of at least 65 cents, "Any Congressman doubting that the President is right on minimum wages should sit down and figure out how he and his family would live on less than $26 a week."

DISTRIBUTION OF CONGRESSIONAL RECORD

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce for appropriate reference a bill which has to do with furnishing copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to veteran facilities, colleges, and institutions of learning throughout the Nation. In my travels about the country at different times, making talks at these installations and colleges and universities, I have found that very often they do not receive copies of the RECORD and they would be very much interested in getting them. I think it is only fair that they should have them in these institutions of learning.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 1405) to provide for distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to Army and Navy establishments and colleges and universities, introduced by Mr. TAYLOR, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

AMENDMENT OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT WITH RESPECT TO CERTAIN AGREEMENTS BETWEEN CARRIERS—AMENDMENTS

Mr. O'MAHONEY submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 110) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act with respect to certain agreements between carriers, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

The following favorable report of a nomination was submitted:

By Mr. WILEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary:

Harold R. Medina, of New York, to be United States district judge for the southern district of New York, vice Samuel Mandelbaum, deceased.

ELECTION FRAUDS IN MISSOURI

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, on Friday last, the subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee having the matter in charge completed a preliminary hearing on Senate resolution 116, the purpose of which is to authorize and direct the committee to make a full and complete study and investigation concerning the failure of the Attorney General of the United States and the Department of Justice to act with respect to alleged irregularities in the Democratic primary election held in the Fifth Congressional District of Missouri on August 6, 1946, with a view to ascertaining whether the Attorney General and the officers of the Department of Justice have properly performed their duties with respect to the investigation and prosecution of any violations of law which may have occurred in connection with said primary election.

The people of my city and my State, long oppressed by fraudulent elections, are grateful for the effective and intelligent approach which the subcommittee, consisting of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] as chairman, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] have made to this important matter. I may say in passing that we are fully satisfied with the procedure of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate in making a preliminary examination. We realize that Senate action is required for a complete investigation, and we are confident that this will be forthcoming in due course.

The charges made against the Attorney General are of a grave character. The Attorney General and the members of his staff should be given ample opportunity to explain fully why the investigation which the Federal Bureau of Investigation was authorized to make was restricted to interviews with only six witnesses; why under date of January 6, 1947, the Department of Justice advised the FBI that "We are closing our file and informing you that no further investigation is desired," and why under date of February 10, 1947, the Attorney General advised the junior Senator from Missouri, who had made an official inquiry, that "the Federal Bureau of Investigation at my instance conducted a full investigation into the charges of fraud in this primary."

I ask unanimous consent to have appended to my remarks at this point an editorial from the Washington Evening Star of last Saturday entitled "What Is a Whitewash?"

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT IS A WHITEWASH?

Attorney General Clark has indignantly denied the charge by two Republican Senators that he was responsible for a whitewash of last year's patently fraudulent Democratic primary in Missouri's Fifth Congressional District.

This was the contest in which President Truman joined hands with the notorious Pendergast machine and the CIO Political Action Committee to defeat the incumbent, Representative SLAUGHTER. A State grand jury has declared that Mr. SLAUGHTER was defeated by a "deliberate, calculated, and premeditated plan to miscount and otherwise steal votes."

Obviously, a mess of this sort holds the ingredients of a first-class political scandal, and the statements of partisans should be handled with caution. Therefore, since the Republicans are charging a whitewash, and since Mr. Clark denies this, the best approach is to examine, not what these individuals say, but the things that were done or not done.

After complaints had been received, the FBI was instructed to investigate. But by the express direction of the Attorney General, the scope of this investigation was severely restricted. According to J. Edgar Hoover, the FBI, under the restraints imposed by Mr. Clark, could do no more than interview four members of the election board and two reporters for the Kansas City Star, who had exposed some of the vote frauds. On the basis of these interviews, plus an examination of the material in the hands of the men questioned, a report was prepared. It revealed no violation of Federal law. In the words of the FBI, however, the contents of this report did not "constitute the results of an investigation, but pursuant to the specific instructions of the Attorney General are merely a summary of data developed by the Kansas City Star and the election board."

It has been intimated that this report served as the basis for a conclusion by three Federal judges that there was no ground for an investigation by a Federal grand jury. It now develops, however, that even this is not correct. All the judges relied on was a synopsis of the report of an admittedly restricted investigation.

It is not clear from all of this that there was a deliberate, conscious effort by the responsible authorities to refrain from unearthing the facts of this stolen election. But it is clear that the Attorney General, until last week, never directed or permitted the FBI to make the thorough investigation of which it is capable, and which Mr. Clark personally and properly has insisted upon in other types of cases affecting civil rights.

There remains the question whether this amounts to a whitewash.

According to Webster's Dictionary, the verb whitewash, in its colloquial sense, means "to exonerate or clear of charges by means of an investigation * * * of a perfunctory or superficial character."

REDUCTIONS IN AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, during the past week I have received numerous communications from farming interests all over the United States expressing deep concern because of the drastic cuts in appropriations affecting the fundamental and most necessary functions and programs of the United States Department of Agriculture.

I believe that the farmers of America are united in their opposition to the drastic cuts, particularly in the so-called section 32 funds, involving appropriations for continuation of the soil conservation program and, more particularly, the total elimination of the 1948 program. All these communications, editorials, and resolutions also express deep concern because of the reduction in funds for school lunch, REA, and the Farmers Home Administration funds.

I certainly hope that the Senate of the United States will correct what I believe to be a serious mistake on the part of the House of Representatives as it deals with agriculture.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a resolution adopted by the County Commissioners of Barnes County, N. Dak.; an editorial from the Fargo Forum, Fargo, N. Dak., dated Thursday, June 5, 1947; and a resolution adopted by the North Dakota Farm Bureau meeting in State convention at Devils Lake, N. Dak., on May 31, 1947.

There being no objection, the resolutions and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

VALLEY CITY, N. DAK., June 4, 1947.

Senator MILTON YOUNG,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR YOUNG: The following resolution was passed by our county board of commissioners on June 4, 1947. I was instructed to send a copy of the resolution to you.

"We, the Commissioners of Barnes County, N. Dak., in session today, have had occasion to study the agricultural appropriation act as it relates to the actual functioning of farm programs in North Dakota.

"1. The proposed reduction of appropriation in the AAA program would very largely wipe out all past gains in the soil building program.

"2. The hot school lunch program must be maintained particularly in our rural areas since it provides a higher nutrition level for the children of our Nation, in addition to the fact that it provides a steady additional market for any items of food that will inevitably be surplus.

"3. The REA program should be expanded rather than reduced. The benefits to farmers who have the use of this service cannot be measured in dollars.

"4. It is essential and most important that adequate funds be appropriated for price support to protect farmers against price collapse.

"5. The Farmers Home Administration has need for and can make excellent progress with adequate funds. To reduce this program would be a disastrous measure, particularly for veterans of World War II and for both veterans and other young folks who wish to purchase a farm under the FO program.

"Be it resolved, That we, the commissioners of Barnes County, urge that you do everything in your power to increase the appropriations above the present recommendations and as near as possible to the recommendations of the Budget Bureau. It is absolutely essential in order that agriculture shall maintain and continue to be a stable part of the national economy."

Yours sincerely,

C. T. BECHTLE,
Barnes County Auditor.

[From the Fargo Forum of June 5, 1947]

BUREAU FOR ECONOMY, BUT WITH SELECTIVITY

An old American truism took a tumble at Devils Lake last Saturday * * * the truism that all groups of American citizens favor tax reduction in the abstract, but kick like a bay steer when tax cuts pare into appropriations touching their particular business, activity or group.

North Dakota Farm Bureau members, taking an entirely reasonable stand and displaying a breadth of vision which many legislators might emulate, decided at Devils Lake that economy must be achieved if government remains strong, and that Department of Agriculture services, along with others, must be cut.

Bureau members, in their discussions, emphasized future demands by consumers for quality in farm products, in the need for research to develop quality and improve the machinery of marketing. They noted that triple A and PMA payments do not bulk importantly in the present farm income—suggesting a chance for cutting the budget right there—but they insisted that the basic machinery of such agencies as triple A be maintained, with an eye out for that future when it will be vital to American agriculture.

Said the Farm Bureau statement: "Unless * * * economy be achieved, the financial structure of the country will be imperiled. * * * In that part of government devoted to agriculture there are many places where economies can be effected, and such economies we approve.

"We believe, however, that these reductions should be made selectively and not straight across the board. We * * * are opposed to reductions * * * which would cripple any research program."

Later in its resolution the Farm Bureau members urged consolidation of all agricultural conservation activities and extension services.

There are two important things to note in this Farm Bureau meeting and the action which it took:

First. While farm group protest meetings often go to one extreme or another, this meeting took a reasonable, carefully considered, middle-of-the-road viewpoint. It recognized that agriculture, too, must share in tax reduction, but it urged a judicious selective weeding which would not destroy the basic services which are needed by the Nation's most basic industry.

Second. The Farm Bureau members put their finger, collectively, on the fallacy of that phrase, "across the board." In education, labor contracts, tax increases and reductions, across the board has been the instrument of lazy minds, and of political minds which dislike direct responsibility.

In government, one service may be tremendously important and its growth may mean great savings of health and money in decades ahead, while another service may be merely a Government rest farm for politically spavined retainers. The easy thing—the thing certain not to make enemies—is to propose an across-the-board cut or increase, aiding or curbing the worthy and worthless services alike, displaying the timid anonymity with which Government action so often is cursed.

We see it in educational budgets, in many labor contracts, where percentage raises or cuts, aids or curbs, take no consideration of individual capacities and needs.

The most precious nucleus of democracy is its regard for the human entity, of human rights above statism—yet most of our institutions entirely disregard this factor when mesmerized by that phrase, "across the board."

Joe may be a wizard of efficiency and John a worthless lout, yet a 10 percent across the board raise sees them as one. In a school budget, history and research and science laboratories may seem particularly important, but the raise in budget looks with as much favor on Latin and dressmaking.

AGRICULTURAL MEETING SPONSORED BY NORTH DAKOTA FARM BUREAU, DEVILS LAKE, N. DAK., MAY 31, 1947

At a meeting held at Devils Lake on May 31, 1947, approximately 400 farmers met to discuss agricultural problems and voiced their opinion on the present and future program for agriculture.

In order that a general statement will be available for those that did attend and also the others that did not have the opportunity to attend this meeting, your secretary will endeavor to give a brief résumé of the topics that were discussed and the suggestions and recommendations made.

It was evident from the statements made by Mr. E. J. Taintor and Dean Walster, of the agricultural college, that research for agriculture was still in the dark ages compared to the amount of money and time spent by industry in the development of their products.

Therefore, farmers should support the proposed legislation in Congress recommended under the Flannagan-Hope bill so that funds would be available for research for agriculture, having in mind that the recent budget estimate for the Research and Marketing Act of 1946 of $19,000,000 should be restored, which was reduced by the Appropriations Committee from $19,000,000 to $6,000,000. Farmers realize that without the proper research in their industry they cannot keep pace with industry. They further realize that without proper research we would not have had the seed, fertilizer, and soil analysis which has favored them in the past years.

The group, therefore, went on record favoring restoration of the appropriation to the amount requested.

Mr. J. Earl Cook, of the North Dakota Dairy Association, gave a brief review of the dairy industry and its importance to farm economy. It is recognized that the dairy farmer has had more obstacles to overcome than any other farm commodity and that the parity formula has been out of line within the past years and our farm organizations have gone on record recommending a favorable adjustment in the industry that is closer to the farm family than any other commodity. Dairy farmers, therefore, request favorable consideration on the following measures:

1. Retain present Federal taxes and regulatory statutes with regard to the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine.

2. Parity formula should be revised so that it represents values which are more nearly in line with current conditions and prices which the producer has to pay. The 1909–14 base is obsolete.

3. We protest anticipated cut in appropriations of United States Bureau of Reclamation which will in turn slow up or stop the progress of irrigation development in North Dakota.

4. We protest anticipated cut in appropriations for United States Department of Agriculture. Particularly do we protest the cut in the school-lunch funds, which were cut from $75,000,000 to $45,000,000.

5. Return to normal pricing and production methods: The Department of Agriculture estimates 2,000,000 fewer cows in 1947 than in 1944.

In discussing the present wool situation, the surplus problem, although due to perhaps a war condition, is facing the wool producers in the United States. In order that the wool producers may be protected, the group went on record favoring the six-point wool program submitted by the American Farm Bureau Federation, giving a support price of about 42 cents per pound to wool producers and also that the Commodity Credit Corporation be authorized to support this program. In other words, this program directs the Secretary of Agriculture to support wool prices at not less than 90 percent of the comparable or revised parity price until the end of the Steagall price-support period; also, retain existing tariff rates on imported wool—at least until the world wool situation becomes more stabilized or the competitive position of domestic wool improves.

The wool and potato situation as it is today may be indicative of the problems that may face agriculture when the foreign demands for farm products may be considerably reduced.

The group went on record inviting the Federal Land Bank to return to North Dakota to make farm loans on terms that have been suggested in Washington by Senator

YOUNG and that the reduced loan basis to approximately 55 or a 60 percent basis would be satisfactory.

It was generally agreed among those that discussed the Farm Credit that the Federal Land Bank is necessary for the development of a necessary farm credit in North Dakota. In other words, the farmers who require and need this service are entitled to consideration.

Mr. Ad Geiger, of Pembina County, presented the present situation in connection with the national crop-insurance program, reviewing some of its history, some of its present weakness, and the lack of participation. Regardless of its present weakness, the group after considerable discussion felt that the crop-insurance program was still in its infancy and that it should be continued if for no other reason than on an experimental basis. Reference was made to the present bill limiting the experience to a number of counties for the various commodities. Some opinions were expressed that there were not sufficient counties included for the various commodities.

However, the group finally approved recommendations of the American Farm Bureau, which favors continuation of crop insurance, both urge its use only with regional adjustments and on a sound actuarial basis.

Mr. J. C. Stewart, of Grand Forks County, reviewed the recommendations of the wheat conference attended by representatives of 13 wheat-growing States held at Omaha in February 1947, where they recognized that after the Steagall price-support period that we may face the same problems as the wool and potato growers are facing at the present time. However, it was felt that with the well-planned program previous to that time that the wheat grower could eliminate some of the expected problems if an organized effort was made to do so.

The export problem would appear to be the major factor to be considered, and the Omaha conference went on record recommending United States participation in the national-wheat-agreement meetings, whereby a planned program could be formulated as soon as possible. Also, that a soil-conservation program should be considered as a requisite of the wheat farmers and not to overstimulate production; that every source for new uses be studied and that the wheat farmers themselves financially support a program to advertise and dispose of their own product.

A report of the recent International Wheat Conference was read wherein we find that two of the main obstacles why the recent Conference failed to reach an agreement was the failure of Argentina to go along with an agreement. However, the real stumbling-block seemed to be the existing bilateral agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom, whereby the Canadian Government fixed a flat ceiling of $1.55 per bushel. This agreement having been made some time ago and the British insisted that this agreement remain in effect regardless of any subsequent international agreement. United States took the position that we could not agree to a ceiling of less than $1.80 for the first year of the agreement.

The group meeting at Devils Lake unanimously agreed that they approved of our Nation's representatives in withholding approval of the so-called international-wheat agreement, and that no agreement should be made which would put our Nation at a disadvantage.

Mr. Ervin Bourgois, of Burleigh County, presented the problem of the conservation program for the farmers, stating that a great deal of confusion exists at the present time due to the fact that there are three agencies; namely, the Soil Conservation Committee, the AAA Committee, and the Extension Service that more or less overlap in the service to the farmers and that there should be some plan formulated that would coordinate these agencies to eliminate this confusion and overlapping.

It was agreed by the group at this meeting that recommendations be made favoring a consolidation of the Soil Conservation Service, the Production Marketing Administration, and the Extension Service, with the belief that such consolidation would result in greater efficiency and economy on the part of the Government and less annoyance and confusion to the farmers, and that selection of those who administer these services should be selected as much as feasible by the farmers in the various States, counties, and communities, and that the local counties and States should have much more power of initiative than they are permitted at the present.

Mr. Chas. Fleming, of Pembina County, outlined the program and services of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, known as the Triple A or Production Marketing Administration. It was recognized by the group that the AAA is the basic factor upon which our present farm program has been built. Also recognizing the fact that too many have interpreted it as an income act rather than a program that was set up to administer the farm program, sponsoring better farming methods, encouraging soil conservation, assisted in handling the commodity credit loan program and which will have considerable to do with our future marketing agreement.

The group, therefore, went on record definitely favoring the continuation of this act at least until such a time as something better is proposed and accepted, realizing that as time goes on progress will make it necessary to modify our present farm program.

Several recommendations were made to change the administration of the AAA program on the State and county levels. Resolutions were passed dealing with the administration on the State and county levels as follows:

1. We do hereby recommend that in the administration of the farm program, more power be placed in the hands of the farmers. That the county committee be given full authority to establish the county farm program operating budget and that they be responsible for the spending of money from said budget.

2. We further recommend that the State of North Dakota be divided into five geographic districts, and that each district have a representative on the State committee. That said representative on the State committee be elected by vote of the chairman of the county committee of said districts.

3. We further recommend that State committee members be elected for a period of 3 years, and that in the beginning, one man be elected for 3 years, two men for 2 years, and two men for 1 year. We also recommend that the director of the North Dakota Extension Service, by virtue of his office, be an ex-officio member of the State committee.

Mr. P. J. Donnelly gave a brief review of the functions of the Farm Advisory Council which is a group of operating farmers who have worked with the staff of the North Dakota Agricultural College in promoting and studying the best methods and services that the North Dakota Agricultural College and especially the experiment station can give to the farmers. The work of the Advisory Council will, no doubt, be of a great service in the future to North Dakota agriculture.

The group also went on record that full support should be given by the Federal Government in the development of the REA in North Dakota and other States which have not made the progress in the development of rural power. Contrary to the American Farm Bureau Federation's recommendation, the Appropriation Committee reduced the funds available for REA loans $25,000,000 below last year and also cut the administrative expenses $1,550,000 below last year.

The American Farm Bureau Federation and member States have been in accordance with the plan of a 20-percent reduction for the Department of Agriculture. However, it was the general opinion of this group that it should be a selective rather than a straight across the board cut in the agricultural appropriations. It was conceded that a larger reduction could be made in the national administrative agency and in some instances on the State level, but the greater encouragement should be given to the farmer committees who are in the best position to administer the various programs.

The group went on record opposing the transfer of the so-called section 32 funds, amounting to $148,000,000, to the United States Treasury. Such funds should be retained to finance the export of surplus agricultural commodities as was intended when such funds were originally segregated; also, that the budget estimate of $19,000,000 for the Research and Marketing Act of 1946 should be restored to its original amount.

In reference to the appropriations set up under the budget estimate of $300,000,000 for the agricultural conservation program under the AAA, it was the general opinion of the group that a reduction in the payment for 1947 was not alarming, neither would it be a financial distress at the present time.

Regardless of this fact, farmers will remember the wheat program and the 30-cent-bonus program whereby a great many of the farmers in our State and elsewhere were deprived of a price for their wheat which they understood would not change during the year and a great many farmers had sold their wheat to make the necessary payments on their indebtedness, due to the fact that they had been given a definite price for the year by the Government agencies.

The group, therefore, felt that the Government or Congress are not acting in good faith for the reason that in the appropriation bill last year Congress authorized the Secretary to announce a $300,000,000 agricultural conservation program for the year 1947, and an announcement of this program, with the rates of payment, was made last fall.

Farmers feel that if the Government and its agencies do not, and will not, keep faith in their promises, the development of the future farm program is going to be difficult.

EXCHANGE OF POLITICAL HORSES IN MIDSTREAM—EDITORIAL FROM THE DAILY OKLAHOMAN

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the interest of the Democratic Party in having invincible proof of the necessity for the continuation of that party in power so that we may be extricated from the many emergencies to be faced, by those who have a thorough comprehension of the problems involved.

At the present time, one of the greatest reasons for the continuation of this party in power is national security and the preservation of that degree of domestic economy which has proved so satisfactory. The present urgency for maintaining the philosophy of the Democratic Party is the continuance of an efficient program to insure ample spending and high employment on the part of the Government in order that the people may be saved from themselves.

In the time intervening between now and the national election, the people of this country may have a lapse of memory and it could be that they would be unaware of the efforts made on behalf of the administration to retain high taxes, high bureaucratic employment, and everything incident thereto. I have seen some suggestions in an editorial of the Daily Oklahoman about certain streams that it might be helpful to the Democratic Party to get us into the middle of because it would be very dangerous to change horses at such a time. This editorial makes certain suggestions which I think the people ought to know about, and especially the Democratic Party which might avail itself of these suggestions. If it does not make a complete campaign issue, it would certainly provide a good slogan, and I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial printed in the body of the RECORD for whatever aid it might be to this worthy end.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHICH SHALL IT BE?

Another Presidential campaign is fast approaching and a casual view of the political field will reveal any number of streams in which it would be positively dangerous to exchange horses. In fact there are as many of those fear-provoking streams as any former campaign was able to uncover.

Just which one of our many available streams is going to be selected as the one in which it will be the most dangerous to exchange political quadrupeds? The strategists will have to make it definite and certain. For the inclusion of all our streams in the danger list might cause the populace to doubt that the entire lot constituted any crossing hazard.

Which shall it be? Are we to hear of the dangers attending the exchanging of horses while the atomic bomb remains uncontrolled or while the national debt remains unpaid or while wartime taxes remain glued to the ceiling? Perhaps we shall hear that it is dangerous to exchange quadrupeds while Asia is in ferment and while the multiplied tribes of Europe are still carrying on the blood feuds that have distracted them for the past 2,000 years.

We ought to know definitely before very long. Time is running out and the planners must choose with little delay the stream whose crossing is supposed to present the maximum of danger. Possibly the most promising of the lot is the issue of the national debt. How about "Don't exchange horses until the national debt is paid"?

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 12, after the words "relating to", it is proposed to insert "freight classifications or to."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the first thing I want to do is clear away some of the confusion caused by a deliberate campaign of misrepresentation that has been carried on for several years. This has been designated by propagandists in opposition as a "railroad" bill. It is true that the railroads and other carriers are supporting the bill, but it is also true that the shippers of the United States are universally asking that the bill be enacted into law. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a tabulation of 958 farm, labor, commercial, and civic organizations who have asked the Congress to enact into law Senate bill 110.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. When was this list compiled? Has it been compiled recently, or is it a list of those who over the years have from time to time approved the legislation?

Mr. REED. It is a compilation of those who have appeared before the Interstate Commerce Committees of the Senate and the House in the Seventy-ninth and Eightieth Congresses when the pending bill and similar bills have b en under consideration.

Mr. RUSSELL. Then it is over a period of 3 years that the organizations named in the list have endorsed the proposed legislation?

Mr. REED. I forget the exact date when the hearings first began on the House side, but the list is a compilation of those who have appeared during the Seventy-ninth and Eightieth Congresses, or at least if they have not personally appeared, testimony has been offered in their behalf.

Mr. RUSSELL. I notice on the Senator's list any number of chambers of commerce from towns large and small scattered all over the United States. I assume that each of those chambers of commerce did not have a representative appear before a congressional committee, but some one individual perhaps from a State would say, "I am authorized to speak for the San Francisco, and the Glendale, and Sacramento, and other chambers of commerce in California." I merely want to clarify the method of preparing this list of supporters of the proposed legislation. Does the list include the names of those who wrote letters to the committees approving the legislation, or only those whose representatives appeared and testified before the committees, or just how was this list compiled?

Mr. REED. The organizations whose names appear on the list endorsed the legislation during the Seventy-ninth or Eightieth Congresses by the name of the bill then before Congress. There was definitely a statement endorsing the bill filed in behalf of each one on the list.

Mr. RUSSELL. But all of them did not appear before congressional committees personally.

Mr. REED. Certainly not.

Mr. President, an analysis of this list of the groups supporting this bill shows by classifications:

Governmental authorities, State and Federal	48
Carrier organizations	20
Shippers', traffic, and transportation organizations	85
Agricultural and livestock organizations	145
Business organizations	108
Chambers of commerce, civic, and other organizations	552
Total	958

I have asked that a copy of this compilation be placed on the desks of Senators. If Senators will examine the list they will undoubtedly find organizations of various characters within their own States.

Let me point out that the National and State regulatory bodies have united in support of this bill. The Interstate Commerce Commission and the Office of Defense Transportation favor it. The National Association of Railroads and Utilities Commissioners, representing the State commissions of the country, with one or two possible exceptions, is not only in favor of this bill but has strongly endorsed the Senate version now before us, in preference to the original version passed by the House last year. Thirty-two State commissions included in the national organization have taken the trouble to file individual support.

The business and shipping organizations that have gone on record in support of this legislation unquestionably represent 99.9 percent of the traffic moving in this country. The support is not confined to business and shipping organizations, although they number over 200. There are 145 agriculture and livestock organizations represented in the document which I have offered for the RECORD. These include the American Farm Bureau Federation, American National Livestock Association, the National Grange, and the National Council of Farm Cooperatives. All these national organizations representing American farm organizations have appeared before Senate committees from time to time and are familiar to all of us.

The chambers of commerce, civic and other organizations, urging that this bill be passed No. 552. In all, this list contains the names of 958 organizations scattered all over the United States.

If Members of the Senate will examine the list they will find organizations supporting this bill from their States. The bill also has the support of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, Express, and Station Employees, and so forth.

Assertions contrary to all the facts, and contrary to common sense, are being made about this subject matter. One would think from some newspapers and columnists that this bill was offered as a Nation-wide conspiracy on the part of the railroads to impose an economic burden on the people of the United States that would destroy their business to discriminate against some areas and sections; in general to make economic slaves of the people of this country.

That is sheer balderdash.

Can any sane person taking an objective look at the list of those supporting the bill for a moment believe that this far-flung group of labor, farm, and business, shipping and civic organizations would join in such a program? To assume that anything of the kind could even remotely be attempted outrages common sense.

I said that this is a shippers' bill as well as a bill affecting railroads. Let me deal with that phase of the subject. I want to show why shippers are vitally concerned.

Railroad transportation is essential to the commerce of the country. No carrier can legally collect a dime for service rendered, and no shipper can legally pay a dime for service received, except the charge be shown in a published tariff, filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission and/or the various State commissions. For 45 years thousands of published tariffs containing billions—I said billions, not millions—of rates have been largely determined through conferences, rate bureaus, and rate associations.

There is no other method by which this first essential of transportation can be completely accomplished.

Numerous traffic and transportation experts appeared before the committees dealing with this type legislation. I asked every one of them this question:

Do you know of any way that the rates necessary to move the traffic of the country can be arrived at, published and filed, except through the rate-bureau and conference method?

In every case the answer was an emphatic "No."

The Interstate Commerce Act requires the railroads to maintain through routes and joint rates; to interchange their freight equipment so that a full carload may move from one side of the country to the other. Anywhere from 1 to 10 roads may be involved in a single shipment.

Does any sane and reasonable person believe for a moment there is any way to carry out this duty which the law imposes on the carriers without their holding conferences and discussing the practical details of rates and services? Yet the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice questions the legality of such conferences, even though shippers freely participate in them.

This is why the bill is regarded as a national necessity by the long list of organizations whose names have been put into the RECORD. Their expert representatives unanimously agree that if the policy begun by the Antitrust Division through grand-jury proceedings in Chicago in 1942 were carried through, chaos would result.

I think I am entitled to speak with some degree of experience and knowledge on this subject. I say to the Senate that the policy of the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice, with regard to rate bureaus and rate conferences would, if carried through, ruin the business life of the country. I am not overstating the case. This is the fact. Every person experienced in traffic and transportation matters will agree.

The Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 provided for agreement between air carriers "not inconsistent with the public interest." Upon approval by the Civil Aeronautics Board, parties to the agreement are relieved from the antitrust laws with respect to carrying out agreements so approved.

The Shipping Act of 1916 permitted agreements by common carriers by water, and provided for immunity from the antitrust laws upon approval of the agreements by the Shipping Board.

It is hard for anyone to understand why, in the face of these facts, so much bitter opposition is offered, when it is proposed to give rail carriers and motor carriers the same exemptions as their air and water competitors now have.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. MOORE. Has the Senator stated how long the rate bureaus had been in existence before they were questioned by the Department of Justice?

Mr. REED. I am very happy to answer the Senator from Oklahoma. The rate-bureau and rate-conference method of making rates has been in effect without question for about 45 years. The last question that was raised about any of the rate bureaus, rate committees, or rate conferences was around the turn of the century. There was the old Trans-Missouri case, in which the rate bureau undertook to exercise arbitrary authority, and the court stopped it. The rate bureaus reformed themselves, and since about 1900 or 1902 there has been no question about their legality, or any suggestion of a conflict with the antitrust laws. About 1941 the Antitrust Division started an investigation in Chicago affecting motor carriers and railroad rate bureaus. In 1942 a grand jury proceeding was begun. It was alleged that there was a criminal violation of the antitrust laws.

Mr. Joseph B. Eastman was alive in those days. He was the greatest transportation statesman of his generation. He was not only chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission but was also Director of the Office of Defense Transportation. Joined by the War Department and the Navy Department, he persuaded or at least got the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice to "lay off." The allegation was correctly made that if the rate bureaus, which constituted the only initiative we had by which rates could be established, were broken up, the war effort would be defeated. That was said by the War Department and the Navy Department. When the War Production Board was established it was authorized to issue a certificate giving to those to whom it was issued immunity from prosecution under the Antitrust Act. It was known as Certificate No. 44, and was issued by the War Production Board to keep the Antitrust Division off the backs of these essential agencies. That certificate expired on October 1 of last year, and there is nothing at this time except a verbal statement or perhaps a written statement by the Antitrust Division that it will not bring any new prosecution until either the courts have decided the cases which are pending or the Congress has legislated in the matter.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I am glad to yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HAWKES. Even after the courts decide the Georgia case and the Lincoln, Nebr., case, still the railroads will be in an area in which they will know nothing about what other prosecutions may be instituted. Is that a correct statement?

Mr. REED. That is correct.

Mr. HAWKES. In other words, they will know nothing definitely except as to the specific questions involved in those two cases?

Mr. REED. That is correct.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I shall be happy to yield to the Senator from Georgia in a moment.

Mr. RUSSELL. Any time that the Senator is willing to yield will be agreeable to me.

Mr. REED. Congress has to legislate upon this question. Transportation is essential to move the commerce of the country. I talked with the Interstate Commerce Commission this morning. The man in charge of the rate bureau stated that they have 58,000 tariffs on file, and of that number approximately 21,000, as I remember, are railroad tariffs. I asked him how many rates were contained in those tariffs, and I had my secretary listen on the extension telephone and take down the answer. The answer was that he could not tell me definitely, but that the number of rates would run into astronomical figures. I said, "Will they run into the billions?" He said, "I think they would probably exceed billions; they would perhaps go into the trillions."

For 40 years the Department of Justice never raised the question. I have given the history of how it came up in 1941 and 1942. Congress must settle this matter. Transporting the Nation's commerce will not be easy, either on the shipping side or on the carrying side, until Congress has laid down a definite policy.

Let me digress for a moment. The great industries which have developed through our commercial history were at one time unregulated. They grew into large units, so large that there was combination between them which had for its purpose increasing prices, decreasing production, or limiting competition. That was unquestionably injurious to the people. Then railroads and public utilities of various kinds, large quasi-privately owned institutions, came into being. So far as I have known, no one has ever undertaken to apply the antitrust law to a public utility. Public utilities have been regulated.

The Interstate Commerce Act was passed in 1887, and through various stages, down to the last extensive amendment which became effective since I have been a Member of this body,, in 1940, the railroads have become the closest and most completely regulated industry in the United States.

Mr. President and Members of the Senate, we can go either way we wish to: We can, as we have done, make the Antitrust Act applicable to the unregulated industries, such as steel, coal, and rubber, which are not regulated, with the exception of safety regulations applying to coal mining; but we cannot apply both methods, the Antitrust Act and regulation, to the same industry. We cannot apply to a regulated industry the antitrust method of preventing combinations. The two methods will not mix.

Now I am happy to yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator has passed the matter about which I wanted to inquire.

Mr. REED. I am very sorry, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is quite all right. I understand how irritating it is to have one's chain of thought disturbed by questions.

Mr. REED. I want to tell a little story. I see that my good friend the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HOEY] is here. He was present at the hearing when this incident occurred. I have said that every experienced traffic man in this country, as well as their principals, are in favor of this bill. It so happened in the hearings last year that there appeared Mr. J. B. Norman, of Louisville, Ky. He is one of the foremost and most able rate practitioners and attorneys in the United States. He happened also to be the principal counsel for the Southern Governors in the Southern Governors' rate case. I think the Senator from North Carolina was very active in promoting that rate case when he was Governor of North Carolina, and had a part in hiring Mr. Norman. It has been said that Mr. Norman, as a representative of the Governors, would be against this bill. He is not; he is in favor of this bill.

I shall read from page 98 of the volume of hearings which has been placed upon the desk of each Senator. Mr. Norman said:

> I am very much in favor the passage of this bill or similar legislation. I have felt for many years that the operation of the railroad bureaus and committees was the cause of many abuses. They were absolutely unregulated and they would have these meetings—which I think are absolutely necessary for them—and in secret session would pass on these proposals made by shippers.

Going over to page 99, I asked Mr. Norman the question which I asked every witness, whether or not, out of his experience, he knew of any other way of taking care of the situation than by the publishing of a tariff of rates and filing it. That is the first essential. A carrier cannot collect, nor can a shipper lawfully pay, a dime for service rendered unless that service is described and the charge published in a published tariff filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission or with a State commission. That is absolutely essential before a carrier can perform service and before it can collect for the service rendered. There are 58,000 tariffs which include rates on file with the Interstate Commerce Commission. There is nothing which touches so importantly the commerce of the country and which goes to the actual transportation of it as does the publishing of tariffs.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. REED. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WHITE. I understood the Senator to say that the alternatives which face us are either to proceed in the courts for enforcement of the antitrust statutes or to turn to our regulatory body and to depend upon the experience, knowledge, and judgment of that regulatory body to deal with many of these questions. Is it not true that for many years the Congress has over and over again directed that the procedure should be through the regulatory body and by means of the regulatory process, rather than through indictments in the courts for violation of the antitrust statutes?

Mr. REED. Yes; the whole procedure has been through the strengthening of regulations, rather than to use the severe and sometimes arbitrary methods of proceeding under the antitrust act.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, if the Senator will further yield, let me say that I understand that the proposed legislation is to be an amendment to be added as a new section to the present Interstate Commerce Act. The pending measure would add a section 5a. Is it not true that in principle this amendment would go on where section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act left off, and would apply new and additional regulatory powers and new methods of handling some of these complicated questions, such as mergers, divisions of traffic, the pooling of traffic, and so forth, and to have those questions determined by men who have given their lives to studying and understanding the minutiae of railroad operations, rather than turn them over to courts of negligible experience in this field?

Mr. REED. The Senator from Maine has clearly and amply stated the situation.

Mr. President, section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act devolves upon the Interstate Commerce Commission complete authority over mergers of railroads and division of rates. The handling of all those matters, up to the question of rate bureaus, is now provided for under section 5.

The pending bill would permit the rate bureaus to continue, but would bring them under the complete regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Paragraph (2) of the bill, which now lies on the desks of Senators, is a description of what it is proposed to do.

Mr. WHITE. My understanding of the situation is that this measure does not constitute a permission for the railroad companies to enter into binding contracts and binding arrangements with respect to all these matters, but that under the bill the most the railroads could do initially would be to file with the Interstate Commerce Commission applications for permission to do the things specified, and then the regulatory body would assert itself, and the railroads might do only the things which the regulatory body expressly authorized and approved.

So there is no proper justification for the charge that the bill, if enacted, would result in turning over to the railroads themselves the authority to do all this manner of things. On the contrary, this measure points out the specific things as to which there must be regulatory approval before they can be done; and without such approval, the railroads can do nothing.

Mr. REED. I shall try to follow through along the line of thought which has been suggested by the Senator from Maine.

Paragraph (3), on page 3 of the bill, provides that:

> (3) Each conference, bureau, committee, or other organization established or continued pursuant to any agreement approved by the Commission under the provisions of this section shall maintain such accounts, records, files, and memoranda and shall submit such reports as may be prescribed by the Commission, and all such accounts, records, files, and memoranda shall be subject to inspection by the Commission or its duly authorized representatives.

Even there, the agreements between carriers are limited.

Paragraph (4), on page 3, provides in part that:

> (4) The Commission shall not approve under this section any agreement between or among carriers of different classes unless it finds that such agreement is limited to matters relating to freight classifications or to transportation under joint rates or over through routes.

In other words, under that provision a separation is made between railroads, express companies, and sleeping-car companies, which are classified as carriers of one class; pipe-line companies, as another class; carriers by motor vehicle, as another class; carriers by water, as another class; and freight forwarders, as another class. Under that provision, carriers of different classes may not make agreements between themselves unless such agreements are limited to the establishment of joint rates and through routes.

Now let us return to page 2, where we find the heart of this bill set forth. It is stated in paragraph (2), on page 2.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. MOORE. I understand the provision the Senator has just read to mean that there will not be permission for carriers of different classes to make agreements between themselves, unless they relate to a through rate.

Mr. REED. That is all.

Mr. MOORE. And then there will be permission to grant the right to make a division of the tariff for the entire journey. Am I correct about that?

Mr. REED. The attempt is to preserve as much competition as possible between, for instance, three carriers of different classes. Obviously, a motor carrier and a railroad should not have anything in common, unless they constitute a through route.

Mr. MOORE. So if the route is part truck and part water carrier and part railroad, they can agree on a division of the charge; is that correct?

Mr. REED. That is correct. They would establish through routes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. In respect to the question which has been suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma, let me say that carriers can get together in regard to a joint rate and can provide the ratio of the rate each shall receive. Is there any requirement that the division must be based on mileage or anything of that sort, or can they make an arbitrary arrangement?

Mr. REED. My answer would be, "No." There is no reference to the basis on which divisions should be made; and in making divisions as between railroads, with which I have some familiarity, generally some consideration is given to the mileage, but not always necessarily so.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is not determinative.

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. CONNALLY. What I had in mind was that a large railroad system has all the advantages over small tap lines, and so forth. Sometimes they do not have any competition; sometimes the small town has no direct connection with any other railroad system than the main system which operates in that territory. If the railroads are free to fix the portion of the rates which shall be allocable to each carrier, I can see some possibility, at least, of injustice.

Mr. REED. I may say to the Senator from Texas that usually, in connection with the division of rates between two or more carriers participating in a division, some consideration is given to the one which originates the traffic, and that would be in favor of the short line.

Mr. CONNALLY. Some consideration would be given; but how much consideration is another matter.

Mr. REED. Frequently a good deal of consideration is given in that way.

Let me say that the American Short Line Railroad Association, to which all the small lines belong, is supporting this proposed legislation.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I should like to submit an observation to the Senator from Texas: Of course, the railroads can enter into no final agreements with respect to rates. The rates are ultimately fixed by the Commission itself, and they are either lawful or unlawful, as the Commission may determine.

Mr. REED. No carrier can collect a cent for a service rendered until the tariff has been filed with and has received the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission or the State commission, as the case may be.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand that. But I say to the Senator from Maine that if the rate were $2.50 for the combined trip, if the carriers are allowed to make the allocation, the large railroad might receive $2 and the small railroad might receive 50 cents. That is what I had in mind; that there would be no restraint upon them in that case.

Mr. REED. It has frequently been charged that at times some power has been exercised by certain railroads over the division of the rates. The classic case of that kind is in regard to the railroads operating between Chicago and Omaha or Chicago and the Missouri River, where the railroads operating between those areas always insisted that the Union Pacific demanded and was able to get a larger share of the through rate on transcontinental business, let us say, than it should. But the Interstate Commerce Commission has power over the division of rates; and I say again that all that anyone needs to do in order to get a hearing is to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DONNELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I was going to suggest that that would require an application by the supposedly aggrieved party which sought to have a correction of the division made; would it not?

Mr. REED. That is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. And if there were any widespread practices of that kind, the result would be to cause a great many applications to be filed and a great many adjudications to be made by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. REED. The Interstate Commerce Commission has at times had before it the question of division of rates. The Senator from Maine remembers that before the Transportation Act of 1920 was passed the railroads in New England were in dire distress financially, and the Interstate Commerce Commission ordered a 10 percent or 20 percent increase in the published through rates out of New England to destination. That case went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court upheld the Interstate Commerce Commission to this extent, that it was proper for the Commission to take into consideration the needs of the carriers in a territory such as New England, as compared with the needs of carriers in other territories.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HAWKES. I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas if it is not a fact, in connection with what the Senator from Texas has just said, that the Interstate Commerce Commission, in finally approving those rates, would, if there were anything which was clearly inequitable, try to cure the inequity. Is not that an accurate statement?

Mr. REED. The Senator from Texas was commenting on an aspect of human nature as to what may happen when a small railroad has the nerve to bring a case against a big railroad and go to the Interstate Commerce Commission. That was the suggestion of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. I did not suggest that. I stated that that might happen.

Mr. REED. If they cannot agree.

Mr. HAWKES. With the trend of affairs as they have been in this country for many years, I should not think the small railroads would have any reluctance in asking for equity.

I wish to say to the Senator from Texas that I do not see how the rates could be averaged on a mileage basis, because there might be a 50-mile pull over the mountains for which the rates would be very much more than for a straight haul on a level stretch which might be 150 miles long. So I think it must be left to the discretion of the parties and their desire to do equity, and finally to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Is that a correct statement?

Mr. REED. That is correct. Take the case of two railroads of the same class. In making their division, a traffic officer will say, "We divide on a mileage basis." In computing rates, of course, distance is always a factor, but not necessarily a determining factor.

Mr. HAWKES. I desire to accentuate the point the Senator from Maine suggested, which I think is very important. Many persons have come to me and said, "Why should you embark on a new philosophy of relationship between corporations and Government by passing such a bill, which takes the antitrust laws off the backs of the carriers in case they do certain things"? Is it not true that it is not a new philosophy of relationship at all? Has not the Congress passed a law, I think in section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act, by which railroads are relieved from responsibility under the antitrust laws in case they merge, or do other things which previously might have been illegal, but which now are legal if they come under the interstate commerce laws, providing they obtain the approval of the Commission?

Mr. REED. That was the genesis of section 5.

Mr. HAWKES. I am heartily in favor of the bill, and I wish to accentuate this point. Section 5a merely permits the doing of certain things necessary and vital in the interest of the public, in the event the procedure provided in the law is followed, and the Interstate Commerce Commission approves the action. Is not that virtually what is provided?

Mr. REED. Stating it liberally, section 5 grants exemption from the antitrust laws to mergers and combinations approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. HAWKES. That is correct.

Mr. REED. That is the substance of section 5, and the pending bill is nothing more nor less than an extension of the powers of the Commission under section 5, to apply to the rate bureaus and rate-making agencies.

Mr. HAWKES. The point I wanted to bring out was that we are not embarking on a new philosophy. We are merely extending the old philosophy. The bill is not bringing new reasoning into the relationship of the antitrust laws to the railroads, except as provided, and we think it is a wise provision.

Mr. REED. Certainly, and we have included many limitations.

Mr. BRICKER and Mr. SALTONSTALL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED. I yield first to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BRICKER. Is it not true that even now, with the rate bureaus acting as they do, the rates all have to be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that any rate with which anyone is dissatisfied may be protested by a shipper, by any carrier party to it, or any other interested party, at any time?

Mr. REED. That is correct.

Mr. BRICKER. And the protest receives full hearing, and if the protestant is not satisfied with the decision of the Commission, he can take the case to court?

Mr. REED. That is correct. As I have said before, let me repeat, no common carrier can collect a dime for a service rendered or to be rendered except on the basis of a tariff filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission and/or a State Commission, as the case might be. The carrier cannot collect anything, and the shipper cannot legally pay anything; otherwise, a shipper who is aggrieved may file an objection informally with the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Commission will consider the objection, and it frequently suspends, as it has the power to do, rates which are filed.

Mr. BRICKER. Even though they have been approved in all respects by the rate bureau?

Mr. REED. Even though they have been approved by the rate bureau.

Mr. BRICKER. Is it not also true that even under the present Transportation Act, until 1941, when the antitrust section of the Department of Justice took its first action, no one had ever considered that the carriers were not relieved from prosecution under the antitrust law when applying for the rate-bureau action, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. REED. I have had a fairly wide experience with these matters, and I never heard of any question in the mind of anyone that the rate bureau which had to file its rates after they were agreed upon and published with the Interstate Commerce Commission was violating the antitrust law. That was a new doctrine to me.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. In line with what the Senator from New Jersey has said—and I think the Senator from Ohio has intimated it, at least—there are two cases now pending in the courts, one in Nebraska, of which I read in the report, and one in the Supreme Court. If we pass the pending bill, Senate 110, are we anticipating the decision of the Supreme Court? To put the question the other way, can the present law, without this amendment to it, be interpreted by the Supreme Court to cover the objective the Senator from Kansas is seeking to attain by the enactment of S. 110?

Mr. REED. Such a suggestion as that, I may say to the Senator from Massachusetts, is one of the red herrings that is drawn across the trail. The investigation begun in Chicago in 1941 resulted in a grand jury action brought in 1942. The Interstate Commerce Committee, of which I am a member, in 1943 started to consider Senate bill 942, and held extensive hearings on it. That was before the Georgia case was ever filed. We saw the need of clarifying this matter before the Georgia folks ever thought of filing a case, and before the Lincoln, Nebr., case was filed.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Then, in the opinion of the distinguished Senator, the argument cannot be made against the pending bill which was made, we will say, against the bill providing for the control of tidal lands, namely, that we are anticipating a decision of the Supreme Court?

Mr. REED. I am not a lawyer, I may say to the Senator from Massachusetts, but I have discussed the Georgia case with numerous lawyers, including Mr. J. V. Norman, who represented the Southern Hardware Traffic Association, and I do not think the pending bill has anything to do with the Georgia case. The Georgia case is necessarily based upon a conspiracy charge. If the State of Georgia cannot establish a conspiracy, it loses its case.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Why is it necessary, then, that this bill be passed, in view of the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission has been acting on these cases over the period of the last 25 years?

Mr. REED. I would say, because the rate bureaus are always faced with a threat of action by the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, it is not only a threat, but an actual prosecution, at the present time.

Mr. REED. A threat of prosecution, I should have said; and it was started in 1942 by actual prosecution.

Mr. BRICKER. If the Senator will yield further, the Georgia case does not go directly in the first instance to the rate-making power.

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. BRICKER. The Georgia case attacks the whole railroad rate system as a conspiracy against the southeastern section of the country.

Mr. REED. That is correct.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HAWKES. To accentuate what the Senator from Kansas has said, I think it might be well to suggest that, according to my recollection, the philosophy of the pending bill was incorporated in a bill by the Interstate Commerce Committee in 1943. That is true, is it not?

Mr. REED. Yes. Former Senator Wheeler introduced a bill similar to this in 1943, and the committee held extensive hearings on it. I am sorry I do not have a copy of those first hearings, which comprise about 1,100 pages.

Mr. HAWKES. I happen to know that what the Senator says is a fact, and the point I wanted to bring out for the Senator from Massachusetts is that the Lincoln, Nebr., case, as I remember it, was instituted 15 months after that, and the Georgia case was filed 13 months afterward; which shows a clear dissociation from the philosophy back of Senate bill 110.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. In other words, the necessity for Senate bill 110 has always been present, but it has never been stimulated or activated, because the interpretation of the old law along these lines has always been dormant, so to speak?

Mr. REED. Section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act was enacted after the merger of the Southern Pacific and the Central Pacific Railroads. The Union Pacific undertook to upset that merger. That caused the enactment of section 5 of the act, which gave the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to grant or withhold permission to railroads to merge. If they were granted that privilege by the Commission, then they were exempted from the operation of the antitrust act. All the pending bill proposes to do is to extend that exemption to the rate bureaus and their machinery for making rates.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I gladly yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. On page 18 of the report where the minority views submitted by the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] appear. He states in the concluding sentence of the third paragraph:

> A dangerous precedent would be set, encouraging other powerful groups to seek legislation immunizing them from established laws and the power of the courts to enforce them.

That statement is made by the Senator from New Hampshire, on the assumption that the pending bill becomes a law. How would the Senator from Kansas answer that?

Mr. REED. Of course, I disagree with the junior Senator from New Hampshire very thoroughly.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I understand.

Mr. REED. In the first place, let me call attention to certain of the statements made by the junior Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Would this bill, if enacted, create a precedent?

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas will yield, let me say that this bill would not create a precedent, but it follows legislative precedent. It follows acts by the Congress giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission power to act affirmatively in matters of this sort, instead of necessitating recourse to the courts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I mention this because it seems to me it should be made clear that, in the event we pass this bill, we are not becoming involved in a controversy with the Supreme Court in pending court actions. Is not that very important?

Mr. WHITE. The 1940 Railroad Act, with respect to certain railroad activities, clearly did precisely the same thing, in principle, that is proposed by the pending bill. It permitted railroads to merge, we will say; but such mergers could become effective only upon approval and after approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission. There was no right in the railroads to enter into effective agreements of this character. They could propose them; that could ask the Commission to approve them; but their right to enter into such agreements rested in the action of the Commission approving or disapproving.

Mr. REED. May I say to the Senator from Massachusetts, there is nothing novel in the pending bill? It creates no new precedent. It merely extends the line of action that has run through all the legislation touching transportation and the regulation of transportation by Congress since 1887. I wish the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] were here. At page 20 of the report, where the minority views are set forth, the Senator from New Hampshire says:

> Similarly, the bill would permit the reestablishment of old arrangements existing under the illicit pullman monopoly recently divested by the courts in an antitrust suit brought by the Government.

It will be remembered that the railroads formed a company and took over the operation of pullman cars. That was attached in the Philadelphia courts by the Antitrust Division. The district court sustained it. The circuit court reversed the district court, and the case went to the Supreme Court, which, by a 4-to-4 vote, failed to interfere with the action of the circuit court. So if there be a monopoly, it has been reestablished without the passage of the pending bill. That is the only point I wanted to make on that suggestion in the minority views.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I note that the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] is in the Senate Chamber. Am I to understand that the Senator from Kansas says that, even if the pending bill should become a law, the suit by the State of Georgia against other States and against the railroads could still be maintained, and that the Supreme Court would still have to decide that case?

Mr. REED. Oh, I think so. I do not think the pending bill touches the Georgia case. I think the Georgia case must of necessity be brought upon a different basis from anything that is touched by the pending bill. In other words, the Georgia case cannot be made to stand unless there be a showing of conspiracy.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia would be willing to answer a question, does he agree with the statement just made by the Senator from Kansas, that the case of the State of Georgia against the railroads would still stand, on the grounds of conspiracy, even if this bill should become a law?

Mr. RUSSELL. No; I certainly do not agree with the Senator from Kansas. There is no question that the pending bill, if it be enacted, will take the heart out of the Georgia case. Of course, the State of Georgia could win the case, as to past transactions, but it would be absolutely denied any protection against future wrongs. Although there has been much injustice heaped upon us in the years that have come and gone, we are not seeking redress with respect to that. We are now looking for opportunities in the future. If the pending bill were enacted into law, it would give us a right without a remedy.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. If there is a conspiracy among certain States and railroads against a section of the country, including the State of Georgia, will not an action still lie in the courts with respect to that?

Mr. RUSSELL. No, because the pending bill will legalize the conspiracy. It will say to the conspirators, "You may proceed under the protection of a law the Congress has enacted." Mr. President, I have not joined in the debate till now, but the pending bill is not like the original bill which was introduced by former Senator Wheeler. It is an entirely different bill. In my opinion, it is designed to defeat the antitrust suit which is pending at Lincoln, Nebr., and the case of the State of Georgia against the railroads to obtain justice in freight-rate matters. I shall not pursue the matter further in the time of the Senator from Kansas which he has so graciously granted, but it is a strange coincidence that every time the hot breath of justice is felt on the neck of the railroads this bill is pushed forward. The hearings have just been concluded before a special master appointed by the Supreme Court, and he is even now preparing his decision in the case. I do not know what the decision will be. From reading the recent decision by the Supreme Court in the Interstate Commerce case, I am hopeful the decision will be in favor of the State of Georgia and its contention.

Whatever may be the final decision of the Supreme Court, I think it is improper, and I shall so insist in the course of my remarks that the Congress should attempt to deny the Court's jurisdiction, and in fact the Court's prerogatives, on the very eve of a decision, and that if that is done the result will be to deny the State of Georgia the relief in the future that they have sought in the pending action. It will not, of course, prevent the State of Georgia from winning the case based on past wrongs, but it will prevent any remedy in the future to the State of Georgia for any future injustices.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HAWKES. I should like to say that I listened to the hearings on this proposed legislation day after day, and I found that there was no argument but that the railroads are controlled by the Government to an extent that nothing else is controlled. That is point No. 1. There was no argument in any of the hearings but that conferences with respect to rates, and so forth, are necessary to adjust the trillions of rates now in existence. I say "trillions," because I asked that specific question half a dozen times. The number of rates went way beyond the billions. I was amazed at the figures involved, but that is what I was told. There was no argument but that this transportation system of ours has got to be operated in the public interest.

I would say to my very distinguished and very much respected friend, the Senator from Georgia, that even if the pending bill were passed, and no point, such as involved in the suit now pending in the Supreme Court, could be raised respecting future actions and reactions, nevertheless if the bill is passed and becomes a law it will be because it is assumed to be in the public interest, and in the interest of keeping transportation operating. I personally simply cannot conceive of conspiracy and intimidation and coercion going on in rate committees and bureaus and being approved by the great Interstate Commerce Commission to the detriment of any State or any community.

Mr. REED. I want to add a word respecting what was said by the Senator from Georgia. I do not think the Senator from Georgia, my very good friend, is quite fair when he says that every time justice is about to overtake the railroads a bill of this kind is brought forth. We had 3 weeks of hearings in 1943 on legislation of this nature on a bill proposing to regulate rates, and the Georgia case was not brought until 1944.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I do not have the bill before me, but I insist that, according to my recollection, the hearings held on the 1943 bill were on the bill offered by the then Senator Wheeler of Montana who was chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, and most of those who are supporting the pending bill vigorously opposed the so-called Wheeler bill. It was an entirely different measure. It gave the various sections and the various shippers a fair chance, but I insist it was not an identical bill with the one now before us, and I do not believe my friend, the Senator from Kansas, will insist that it was an identical bill.

Mr. REED. This is not an identical bill with the former one. I never said it was an identical bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. The general philosophy of the pending bill was involved in the former bill, but there is a difference in their provisions. I say the pending bill was designed to cut the ground out from under the Lincoln, Nebr., case and the State of Georgia case. The pending bill is different from the one introduced in 1943.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. The little colloquy which has taken place between the Senators from Kansas, New Jersey, and Georgia prompts me to ask whether the organizations listed in the tabulation we find on our desks and which are submitted to the Senate as being supporters of the bill which is now before the Senate took such action endorsing the pending bill after the bill was introduced, or whether a good share of those on the list were not on record as supporting the bill which has been referred to and which was introduced by former Senator Wheeler, of Montana? Are they all new endorsements, or do they go back over a period of years?

Mr. REED. As I have already said, the endorsements of the legislation were first given in the Seventy-ninth Congress when the original Bulwinkle bill was introduced in the House. The endorsements continued to pile up in the Senate when the Bulwinkle bill came here in the Seventy-ninth Congress.

Mr. AIKEN. Then may I ask: Is the bill which we are considering identical or practically identical with the Bulwinkle bill which was introduced in the last session of Congress?

Mr. REED. I think the pending bill is a better bill than the original Bulwinkle bill. I was going to undertake to show in what respect we have made a better bill of the pending measure.

Mr. AIKEN. There have been, have there not, some changes made?

Mr. REED. Yes. I shall be glad to take up that phase of the matter now.

Mr. AIKEN. I want to make sure that the endorsements which are submitted in this tabulation refer to the pending bill.

Mr. REED. They do not all refer to the pending bill in its present language, but the endorsements refer to the pending bill or its predecessor, the Bulwinkle bill, introduced in the House in the Seventy-ninth Congress.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HAWKES. Is it not correct to say that the previous endorsements certainly all apply to everything controversial contained in the pending bill?

Mr. REED. The endorsements go to a bill which was much more drastic than the pending one.

Mr. HAWKES. That is my point. In other words, those endorsements went to a bill which contained everything of a controversial nature which this bill contains, and the pending bill has things in it which we think cure provisions which were thought evil and which were objected to?

Mr. REED. Originally the Bulwinkle bill as it came to the Senate last year contained in paragraph 2 the following language, which I shall read:

> Any carrier, party to an agreement between or among two or more carriers * * * may, under such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe, apply to the Commission for approval of the agreement, and the Commission shall by order approve any such agreement.

We have written into the bill a limitation which reads:

> Any carrier, party to an agreement between or among two or more carriers—

Here is our language—

> concerning, or providing rules or regulations pertaining to or procedures for the consideration, initiation, or establishment of, rates, fares, charges * * * classifications * * * time schedules—

And so forth. There again is our language—

> if it finds that the object of the agreement is appropriate for the proper performance by the carriers of service to the public, that the agreement will not unduly restrain competition, and that it is consistent with the public interest as declared by Congress in the national transportation policy set forth in this act.

That is our language. When the bill came to us it was a wide-open bill. Any agreement between carriers could be submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission. We say these agreements must be limited to the things which we describe. They must be in the public interest. They must not unduly restrain competition. They must be consistent with the national transportation problem. We cannot go any further in limiting the character of the agreements which may be made and offered to the Commission for its approval or disapproval.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Will the Senator from Kansas permit me to point out one thing? I notice on the first page the Vermont Public Service Commission is listed as one of the endorsers of the bill. I should like to say that in the last election the people of Vermont indicated very clearly that they wanted a change in the Vermont Public Service Commission, and they made their desire known in no uncertain language. The change was made. I would be very much surprised if the present Vermont Public Service Commission has endorsed the bill.

Mr. REED. I cannot answer the Senator's question.

Mr. AIKEN. That is the reason why I asked when the endorsements were made. I would not say that the commission would not endorse the bill, but I say I would be very much surprised if the commission did do so.

Mr. REED. The National Association of Railroad and Public Utility Commissioners has endorsed the bill.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not question that in the least. I think they would also endorse the pending bill.

Mr. REED. Within the past 2 weeks I have received a letter from the solicitor in Washington of the National Association of Railroad and Utility Commissioners, in which it is stated that at a recent meeting of the executive committee the committee reendorsed the bill, and expressed strong preference for the Senate version as being an improvement over the original Bulwinkle bill.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not question the statement of the Senator from Kansas at all. I simply stated that, in view of the fact that the reorganization of the Vermont Public Service Commission was completed only about a month ago, in accordance with the mandate of the voters of the State, I would seriously question whether they had taken any action on the bill.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HAWKES. The Senator from Vermont is not indicating that they would not approve this bill, is he? As I understand, the Senator is simply indicating that the commission has not had time to consider and approve it.

Mr. AIKEN. I am simply stating that the actions of the Public Service Commission of Vermont entered very strongly into last year's primary elections in the State. Disapproval of certain acts of the commission was expressed by the voters. As a result the commission has been reorganized this spring. I doubt if any action has been taken as yet. I do not know what the action would be.

Mr. HAWKES. The Senator is not intimating, is he, that he believes the Vermont commission, if it were to review the facts today, would say that it was opposed to the bill?

Mr. AIKEN. I think it would be difficult to obtain an endorsement of any railroad or power monopoly from the present Vermont Public Service Commission.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, I have not been a Member of the Senate for many years, but I have sat through a great many hearings. I have never seen such uniform approval of anything as I noted in the hearings on this bill. I heard many words from the Department of Justice, which raised various questions. However as I recall, every other Government department was in favor of the bill.

Aside from the Department of Justice, I did not hear a representative of a single organization who did not say that this was an enormous job, and that it had to be done efficiently. While some representatives of the Department of Justice questioned the wisdom of granting this exemption, nevertheless they all admitted that the job had to be done. No one suggested any better way to accomplish the objective of maximum transportation in the interest of the American people than the way proposed by the pending bill, with the controls and regulations it provides by the bill. We have the finest transportation system in the world. I have been all over the world, and there is nothing elsewhere to compare with it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have had experience with virtually all transportation legislation proposed or adopted in the past 25 years. I have never seen a piece of legislation before the Congress of the United States which had so nearly the unanimous approval of the entire shipping public as has this bill. I stated in my opening statement that I thought the organizations which had endorsed the bill—I am speaking now of traffic and industrial organizations—represent 99.9 percent of the traffic which moves in this country.

The present situation is intolerable. We cannot permit it to continue. With due regard not only to the transportation agency, but to the shipping public, the Congress must lay down a policy. The action of the Antitrust Division—I have a difficult time to keep from saying "the screwballs in the Antitrust Division"—and its interpretation of the antitrust law so threaten transportation that the Congress must declare its policy.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. AIKEN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COOPER in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

STATUS OF PUERTO RICO

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, as a result of our war with Spain in 1898, we secured the Territory of Puerto Rico. For approximately 15 years, when I was chairman of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, I endeavored to have the Congress take some action which would settle the ultimate status of Puerto Rico. I am no longer a member of the committee dealing with Puerto Rican affairs, but I have introduced in this session of Congress a bill which I think presents one of the possible solutions.

However, my purpose today is to call to the attention of the Senate, and particularly to the attention of the able chairman of the Public Lands Committee, under whose jurisdiction Puerto Rican matters now come, a table of expenditures, by years, from the United States Treasury in the nature of appropriations or donations to Puerto Rice. Nothing could be more eloquent to show the present unsatisfactory status of the island than this table. I should like to read one or two figures from it.

In the year 1944, the customs taxes collected in Puerto Rico were $1,900,000; the income taxes collected there were $16,243,029; the United States internal revenue taxes collected there were $63,884,358. The total obtained from those three sources was $82,027,387, all of which, under present law, we authorized the Puerto Ricans to keep in their own treasury, and none of it came into the Treasury of the United States.

In addition to that, in 1944, the payments made to Puerto Rico in the form of direct payments along the line of those made to the States under cooperative arrangements, grants to, expenditures, and so forth, amounted to $19,692,474. Thus, out of the Federal Treasury, in 1944, $100,000,000 went into Puerto Rico, for the support of the people who live there.

In 1943, approximately $60,000,000 from the same sources went to Puerto Rico.

There are approximately 2,000,000 people in Puerto Rico, or one person to every acre of land, including the mountains, cities, land that is not suitable for tillage, and the like.

I hope the Committee on Public Lands, when it has opportunity to do so, will review this table and will review the Puerto Rican situation, with which I know the chairman of the committee is already somewhat familiar, because he has visited that Island, in an effort to try to work out some solution of the Puerto Rican problem.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield, although I do not wish to hold the floor very long.

Mr. BUTLER. Let me ask the Senator to state the source of the table which he intends to have printed in the RECORD.

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly. These figures were sent here at my request. They come from the United States Bureau of the Budget, and they show in detail the collections from customs taxes, income taxes, and United States internal revenue taxes, and a long category of direct appropriations.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator will have that table inserted in the RECORD, will he?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes, at the end of my remarks.

I wish to say that many Members of the Senate are not aware of the fact that in order to help Puerto Rico economically we permit her to keep all the income taxes which are paid by Puerto Ricans and all the customs taxes which are paid on imports into Puerto Rico, as well as all the United States internal revenue taxes which are collected in Puerto Rico. In 1944 they amounted to $82,000,000.

So we can see the great necessity for arriving at some solution of the Puerto Rican problem, for as the situation is today we are simply keeping the Puerto Ricans in a state of suspense until we can find some better way to deal with the matter.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of my remarks this table, which was furnished to me by the Bureau of the Budget, and includes a tabulation of the moneys in the categories to which I have referred, for the years 1935 to 1944, inclusive, be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I hope Senators may have an opportunity to study the table, because I know that many of my colleagues who have not had contact with this problem are unaware that, contrary to the normal situation, in which all the money obtained from taxes from the citizens of the United States goes into the Federal Treasury, in the case of Puerto Rico the money obtained by the payment of taxes and the collections of customs in that island remain in the Puerto Rican State or Territorial treasury, for expenditure for local purposes.

This situation has grown progressively worse since I have been a Member of the Senate, and at some time we should proceed to determine what the long-time solution will be, in fairness to the people of Puerto Rico and the taxpayers of the United States of America.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Maryland for his remarks and suggestions. I wish to say that already a number of the members of the subcommittee on Territories and Insular Possessions of the Committee on Public Lands have visited Puerto Rico with a view to recommending ultimately some sort of solution, and it is the intention of the chairman of the subcommittee and several of the members to visit the island again between the adjournment of the present session and the opening of the next.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator from Nebraska for his comment. I conclude my brief summation with the statement that if the question of independence for Puerto Rico, similar to the action taken with relation to the Philippines, is put on the ballot in Puerto Rico and submitted to the people for rejection or acceptance, in my opinion an overwhelming majority of them will vote for independence, not because they dislike the United States, because I think they are fond of our country, but because there is no satisfactory solution of the Puerto Rican problem under the stepfather treatment we are compelled to give to questions affecting Puerto Rico, because they are not represented in both bodies of the Congress—they have only a Resident Commissioner in the House—they are far away from us, and we do not see the plight with which the people are confronted. So I am hopeful that when the members of the subcommittee return, one of the things they will recommend will be the submission to the people of Puerto Rico of the question of independence, for rejection or acceptance.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I know how long the Senator from Maryland has been interested in the welfare of Puerto Rico and the other possessions of the United States. I am wondering, from the remarks he has just made, whether in his opinion independence is the final solution.

Mr. TYDINGS. In my opinion independence will result in certain hardships, certain handicaps, and place certain liabilities upon the people of Puerto Rico. On the other hand, it will give them certain assets and privileges and opportunities which they now do not have. In my opinion, the over-all, long-time result, assuming independence is granted, will produce for the Puerto Rican people eventually a happier and more permanent status, both economically and politically, than they will enjoy if we continue the present system.

LABOR LEGISLATION — ADVERTISEMENT FROM THE WASHINGTON STAR

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask permission to have published in the body of the RECORD an advertisement appearing in today's issue of the Washington Star. It is a summary of the President's reasons for vetoing the Case bill last year. I think those reasons are particularly apropos for review purposes at the present time, because in my opinion the reasons set out in the advertisement are unanswerable when it comes to the consideration of a veto of the Taft-Hartley bill. In fact, I consider the Taft-Hartley bill even more destructive of sound public interests than the Case bill, bad as that bill was.

There being no objection, the advertisement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WE YIELD TO THE CRYSTAL GAZERS

Years ago we resolved to let others do the predicting—while we confined our effort in directing the policy of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, in keeping with the authority vested in the brotherhood's chief executive officers, by action of the lawfully elected delegates in international convention assembled.

This arrangement has worked out so well that we propose to stay with it and let the crystal gazers do the predicting. In that spirit we submit for consideration the following facts.

After carefully studying the Case bill last June, the President of the United States returned it to the Congress unsigned. He accompanied it with a message in which he said, "I would not be properly discharging the duties of my office if I were to approve of H. R. 4908."

In this message the President pointed out certain structural defects in the bill and in constructive fashion the President requested a comprehensive legislative program designed to remove some of the causes of the insecurity felt by many workers and employers—to deal with the underlying causes of industrial strife and unrest.

Believe it or not, the Taft-Hartley bill contains the very same provisions which the President found objectionable in the Case bill. It also contains objectionable provisions which were not in the Case bill—some are political—some trouble-making—some reactionary—and some are very dangerous.

In framing the Taft-Hartley bill the committee paid not the slightest attention to the President's recommendations.

We quote from Public Document No. 651, "Message from the President of the United States, The White House, June 11, 1946," page 5. Referring to section 4 of the Case bill the President said, "Section 4: This creates a new five-man Federal Mediation Board. All mediation and conciliation functions of the Secretary of Labor and the United States Conciliation Service are transferred to the Board. The Board, although technically within the Department of Labor, would not be under the control of the Secretary of Labor.

"I consider the establishment of this new agency to be inconsistent with the principles of good administration. As I have previously stated, it is my opinion that Government today demands reorganization along the lines which the Congress has set forth in the Reorganization Act of 1945, i. e., the organization of Government activity into the fewest number of Government agencies consistent with efficiency. Control of purely administrative matters should be grouped as much as possible under members of the Cabinet, who are in turn responsible to the President.

"The proposed Federal Mediation Board would have no quasi-judicial or quasi-legislative functions. It would be purely an administrative agency. Surely, functions of this kind should be concentrated in the Department of Labor. * * *

"The bill proposes to transfer that Service and its functions to the newly formed Federal Mediation Board. To me this is the equivalent of creating a separate and duplicate Department of Labor, depriving the Secretary of Labor of many of his principal responsibilities and placing the conciliation and mediation functions in an independent body.

"In the eyes of Congress and of the public the President and the Secretary of Labor would remain responsible for the exercise of mediation and conciliation functions in labor disputes, while, in fact, those functions would be conducted by another body not fully responsible to either.

"As far back as September 6, 1945, I said in a message to Congress: 'Meanwhile, plans for strengthening the Department of Labor, and bringing under it functions belonging to it, are going forward.' The establishment of the proposed Federal Mediation Board is a backward step." (Secs. 201–205, the Taft-Hartley bill, is substantially the same.)

Page 7: Referring to section 9 of the Case bill, the President said, "Section 9: This provision deprives supervisory employees of their status as employees for the purposes of the National Labor Relations Act.

"This section would strip from supervisory employees the rights of self-organization and collective bargaining now guaranteed them under the National Labor Relations Act. I fear that this section would increase labor strife, since I have no doubt that supervisory employees would resort to self-help to gain the rights now given to them by law.

"This complex question has long been under consideration by the National Labor Relations Board. The Board and the courts have pointed out that supervisory employees have a dual capacity. In dealing with the employees under them, they act for management. However, with respect to their own wages, hours of work, and other terms and conditions of employment, they act for themselves. The full right of supervisory employees to the benefits of collective bargaining is one that cannot be lightly thrown aside.

"On the other hand, management is entitled to proper protection. Somewhere in the area of disagreement between the parties the line can be drawn with reasonable accuracy. There has been no attempt to draw that line in this section." (Secs. 2 (11) and 14, Taft-Hartley bill, are substantially the same.)

Page 8: In concluding, the President said, "The passage of H. R. 4908 confirms the need for a careful study of labor-management problems, with a view toward long-range remedies. It demonstrates the dangers of attempting to draft permanent labor legislation without painstaking and exhaustive consideration.

"H. R. 4908 strikes at symptoms and ignores underlying causes. * * *

"It must be remembered that industrial strife is a symptom of basic economic maladjustments. We cannot attribute work stoppages to any one factor. As we move from war to peace, severe strains are placed upon our economic system. Labor and management alike are seeking security. The combination of rising prices, scarcity of commodities, lowered standards of living, and altered tax programs today creates fears which are present at the conference table to disturb the orderly process of collective bargaining.

"A solution of labor-management difficulties therefore is to be found not alone in well-considered legislation dealing directly with industrial relations, but also in a comprehensive legislative program designed to remove some of the causes of the insecurity felt by many workers and employers.

"During the past 10 months I have urged the Congress to enact such a program. Among the proposals which I have recommended are adequate insurance against unemployment, health, and medical services for families of low and moderate income at costs they can afford, a fair minimum wage, and the continuance of the price-control and stabilization laws in effective form. These measures would remove some of the major causes of insecurity and would greatly aid in achieving industrial peace.

"Our problem in shaping permanent legislation in this field is to probe for the causes of lock-outs, strikes, and industrial disturbances. Then, to the extent possible, we must eliminate these causes. Strikes against private employers cannot be ended by legislative decree. Men cannot be forced in a peacetime democracy to work for a private employer under compulsion. Therefore, strikes must be considered in the whole context of our modern industrial society. They must be considered in the light of inflationary pressures, of problems of full employment, of economic security.

"Legislation governing industrial relations is workable only when carefully considered against this broad background. I am confident that with painstaking and dispassionate study which will probe fairly and deeply, Congress can evolve equitable legislation which promises an era of peaceful industrial relations.

"We accomplish nothing by striking at labor here and at management there. Affirmative policy is called for, and a congressional committee such as I have suggested is the best means of formulating it.

"There should be no emphasis placed upon considerations of whether a bill is antilabor or prolabor. Where excesses have developed on the part of labor leaders or management, such excesses should be corrected—not in order to injure either party but to bring about as great an equality as possible between the bargaining positions of labor and management. Neither should be permitted to become too powerful as against the public interest as a whole.

"Equality for both and vigilance for the public welfare—these should be the watchwords of future legislation.

"The bill which I am returning to you does not meet these standards. * * *

"It is always with reluctance that I return a bill to the Congress without my approval. I feel, however, that I would not be properly discharging the duties of my office if I were to approve H. R. 4903."

(The Taft-Hartley bill, like the Case bill, is not the answer.)

"It is not labor, but the opponents of labor whose greed is endangering our prosperity and threatening a depression. It is not labor, but the opponents of labor, who have too much power. Who are these overly powerful people of whom I speak? Look to the organizations backing this bill, and there you will find them—this bill is not in the best interests of the whole American people." (Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 12, 1947.)

A. F. WHITNEY,
President, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I am much interested in the matter the Senator from Oregon has just asked to have inserted in the RECORD, indicating why, based on the precedent of the veto of the Case bill last year, the President must obviously veto the labor bill this year. I wondered if there was a parallel advertisement stating that, since the President, in October 1945, signed a bill giving the big corporations the benefit of a reduction of $4,000,000,000 in excess-profits taxes, he must necessarily sign the tax-reduction bill this year.

Mr. MORSE. I hope the Senator from Maine will not press very far with that argument. It is based on one of the false premises of the Republican majority in this Congress that two wrongs make a right. Experience now shows we made a mistake in lifting the excess-profits taxes because it did not promote as much production as it did profiteering.

Mr. BREWSTER. I am sure we shall be much interested to see how far consistency is still considered a virtue.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1288) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant a private right-of-way to Roscoe L. Wood.

AMENDMENT OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT WITH RESPECT TO CERTAIN AGREEMENTS BETWEEN CARRIERS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 110) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act with respect to certain agreements between the carriers.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, in my opinion the pending bill, the so-called Bulwinkle-Reed bill, presents to the Senate several of the most far-reaching and fundamental issues we will be compelled to determine at the present session of the Congress. As I see the measure, it vitiates and weakens the antitrust laws of this Nation. It has the effect of immunizing the railroads, with all their many and appurtenant bureaus, with their other forms of transportation, and through them, many other allied industries and financial interests, from any fear of the consequences because of the violation of the antitrust laws. The bill clearly, plainly, and in express terms, eliminates the antitrust laws so far as the railroads are concerned in case they follow the procedure therein outlined.

Furthermore, Mr. President, the measure would remove from the jurisdiction of the courts of this land two tremendously important pieces of pending litigation against the railroads and the appurtenant freight bureaus, one of them being the State of Georgia case, pending in the Supreme Court of the United States sitting as a court of original jurisdiction, the other being the civil action filed through the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice in an effort to break the stranglehold which the railroads have had upon the people of the West, and to obviate the discrimination against them in freight rates which they have so long borne.

I think it is clear to all that control of the transportation system empowers the controlling agency to direct the course of all industries and of all commerce in this Nation. It empowers those hands to make desolate some areas and to see that others flourish as the rose.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas, in presenting this matter, stated that against his bill there had been a campaign of propaganda which had been unfair and injust. He referred to certain commentators, who were unnamed, or writers of one kind and another, likewise unnamed, who, he said, had attacked the pending bill as being the entering wedge for striking down the antitrust laws. Mr. President, as one who has been on the other side of the fence in this legislation, I have not heard nor encountered the propaganda referred to by the Senator from Kansas; but I have seen at every stage of the proceeding the best organized, the best financed, and the smartest propaganda machine back of the pending bill that has ever promoted legislation in the Congress of the United States.

The Senator from Kansas offers a long list of governmental agencies, and of organizations of one kind or another which he says have supported the bill. To my mind, after 14 years of service in the Senate of the United States, and 10 years in a State legislative body, the Senator could not have produced higher or better evidence of the activities of a comprehensive, able propaganda machine that has flooded the offices of Senators with letters in support of the bill, than this list of organizations affords. On the slip the Senator uses, to accompany his argument, the analysis of various associations and organizations supporting S. 110, he arrives at a total of 958 different organizations scattered all over the country. I wish respectfully to point out that 552 of the organizations are chambers of commerce, civic, and other organizations. I hastily scanned through the list, to see why there has been this spontaneous combustion of ideas all over the United States to appeal to the Congress of the United States to relieve from the provisions of the Antitrust Act the poor, oppressed railroads, constituting a great hierarchy already controlled by one or two financial interests. I find in the list the names of certain very interesting organizations. What I say, Mr. President, is not a disparagement of the organizations purporting to endorse the pending bill, but is intended to show the methods which have been employed to put the heat on the Congress of the United States to enact a bill which should never reach the statute books.

I was born and reared near a town of less than 4,000 population. I have been a member of the Kiwanis Club and of the local chamber of commerce and of other civic organizations in that town. I know how they operate. When I am shown a list containing the names of the Bernal, Calif., Boosters Club; the Camden, Tenn., Lions Club; the Ely, Nev., Lions Club; the Mexico, Mo., Civic Club, and other organizations of that nature, that presumably come forward and appeal to the Congress of the United States to repeal the antitrust laws so far as the railroads are concerned, I know what has happened. I know that the railroads, through the vast machinery of their organizations, with the smartest attorney in every town representing them, have had speakers go from one end of the country to the other, appearing in small towns before the Boosters Club and the Lions Club and the Civic Club, whose members have never heard of the Bulwinkle-Reed bill, who have no detailed information on the most complicated thing in our economy today, the freight-rate structure of the country; who do not understand even the impact of that structure upon their community and the business which they operate. After the members and guests have enjoyed the good dinner which has been prepared, perhaps by the ladies of the WCTU in an effort to obtain funds for their organization, the smart lawyer will rise and make them a speech and tell them about the great handicaps under which the railroads are laboring. By skillful innuendo, he throws out the hope that this particular piece of legislation, the bill now pending, will benefit that community and perhaps get them a better freight rate. He says to them, "You do not want to see your transportation system in America endangered." Then, the member present who is his closest friend gets up and says, "I move you, Mr. President, that the Boosters Club go on record as favoring S. 110"; whereupon, the secretary of the club, in the discharge of his duties, writes a letter to the Interstate Commerce Committees of the House and Senate, saying that El Cardo Boosters Club is a strong supporter of S. 110.

Mr. President, to take that kind of testimony as representing 99.9 percent of the people of the United States—as I recall, the Senator from Kansas said the shippers of the United States—is to put the Congress of the United States at the mercy of any powerful lobby having its ramifications reaching out into the grass roots in every community of the land, and to make the Senate the servile tool of the interests that are able to build up and generate such power-propaganda machines. So I say, Mr. President, in all earnestness and in all good faith, the talk about propaganda suggests that the shoe should be on the other foot. Who has been in a position to send speakers to the Niles (Calif.) Chamber of Commerce and ask them to oppose this bill? Where has there been an organization that has had certain able men whom they could send into the remote reaches of the far West, to appear before the people there and explain to them how they have been discriminated against in the freight-rate structure of the country, to tell them how the blighting hand of concentrated wealth had stopped the development of their industries and sought to keep them as hewers of wood and drawers of water—the producers of the raw materials of the country? They ship to the favored areas, to be processed; they pay the freight both ways. They have seen only one side of the picture, and that side was seen in a distorted light.

No, Mr. President; I am confident the Senate will not be persuaded merely by a long list of imposing names. Those of us who are defending the antitrust laws, those of us who are speaking for the less-favored areas, those of us who are speaking for the integrity of our judicial system, and for the opportunity to permit that system to determine the cases which are submitted to it in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, have no such means. We do not have thousands upon tens of thousands of agents to go forth and beat the bushes, and to have letters written to the Senate. We do not have one. I am not familiar with the propaganda denounced by the Senator from Kansas. I do know, though, that in my own office I have received a great many letters from shippers in my State, urging the support of Senate bill 110.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield gladly.

Mr. McFARLAND. The names of those shippers do not appear on this list, do they?

Mr. RUSSELL. I assume, Mr. President, from the length of the list, that some of them must have gotten onto the list.

Mr. McFARLAND. I do not see any of them.

Mr. RUSSELL. We have Boosters' Clubs, we have Lions Clubs, we have chambers of commerce, we have civic organizations in my State. I suppose that they are very much like the American citizens of other sections of the country.

Mr. McFARLAND. Does the Senator suppose that possibly the railroads have suggested to a shipper that they had done a little favor for him?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I was just coming to that. I thank the Senator from Arkansas for that suggestion. When I write to the shippers in my State and tell them "I am sorry, but I cannot comply with your request that I support the Bulwinkle-Reed bill; instead of starting to whittle away the antitrust laws of the country they should in my opinion, be strengthened in the interest of the average man; and I know that we will forever be chained to the present system of freight rates, the structure of which starts with the local bureaus and continues up to the American Association of Railroads, if the pending bill were enacted into law—when I tell them that, I am surprised at the number who write in and state that their good friend, a traveling representative for such-and-such a railroad, had come by and talked to them about the bill and asked them to write letters respecting it, and who later have said that they did not understand exactly all that was implied in the proposed legislation, and that if that was the kind of bill it was they wanted to withdraw their requests that I support the bill in the Senate, and instead they now hoped that I would vote against the bill.

Mr. President, as I have said, there never has been so thorough, so complete and so one-sided a presentation of a bill to every nook and corner of the United States as there has been in the support of this proposed legislation. I know that all Senators have received a great volume of correspondence urging them to support the bill. Undoubtedly they have not received any correspondence asking them to oppose the bill, because it has not been presented in all its implications to the American people, and no agency less than the full Government of the United States could ever hope to present it to all the American people, because no other agency than the powerful interests supporting would have the means with which to do it.

So, Mr. President, we have this effort which is now being made to destroy the jurisdiction of the courts of the land in two important cases, which are vital to the great West, and to the South whence I come. We have this effort made here to immunize the railroads from the operation of the antitrust laws at a time when monopoly is on the march. Small business in this country is being destroyed every day.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. MOORE. I am anxious to understand the gravamen of the case which the State of Georgia filed in the Supreme Court as a court of original jurisdiction. Did that case have anything to do with matters dealt with in the pending bill, that is respecting rate-fixing bureaus, or is not that case an action brought to determine whether there was discrimination in freight rates.

Mr. RUSSELL. The charges were conspiracy to invoke unfair freight rates against the State of Georgia.

Mr. MOORE. That is correct.

Mr. RUSSELL. And if the pending bill is enacted into law it will legalize in the future the very thing the State of Georgia complained of in its suit.

Mr. MOORE. Suit was brought by the State of Georgia, and an action was also brought by the Department of Justice against the rate bureaus in Nebraska, I believe it was, at the time when the certificate, so-called, No. 44, was in effect, were they not?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I do not recognize certificate 44 by number.

Mr. MOORE. That was the certificate issued during the war which prohibited the Department of Justice from proceeding in the prosecution of those who were charged in Chicago, I believe it was. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. McFARLAND] has heard all the testimony, and can clarify the situation.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. I think the Senator has correctly stated the situation. Order No. 44 was issued as a result of legislation passed by Congress.

Mr. MOORE. That is correct.

Mr. McFARLAND. By reason of the state of war, it was not thought best to have a great many suits pending at a time when different industries needed to be devoting all their efforts to the war.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am familiar with the regulation to which the Senator refers, but I did not recognize it by the number. During the war the War Department, the Navy Department, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Office of Defense Transportation requested and secured the issuance of an order which precluded or stopped some criminal prosecutions against the railroads and the freight-rate bureaus for the violation of the antitrust acts.

Mr. MOORE. Then it follows, does it not, that the suit brought by the State of Georgia does not embrace the activities of the bureaus which the pending bill provides may be exempt from prosecution under the antitrust acts?

Mr. RUSSELL. Oh, no; I do not think it follows at all, I may say to the Senator from Oklahoma. The order which was issued by the Federal Government, according to my recollection, applied to criminal prosecutions in the first instance, and not to civil proceedings, such as involved in the suit brought by the State of Georgia.

Mr. MOORE. But the effect would be the same.

Mr. RUSSELL. In the second place, the order which was issued was merely a directive to the United States attorneys and the Department of Justice. Even with all the vast powers which we grant to the executive agencies of government in time of war, I doubt whether there could have been issued an order which would have precluded the State of Georgia from its rights as a sovereign State to seek to right a wrong which had been done to the State of Georgia or its citizens.

Mr. MOORE. I am sure the Senator from Georgia is more familiar with the facts presented to the court in the State of Georgia case than I am, but I thought that that case did not involve matters contained in the pending bill, that is respecting the rate bureaus, but if it did, it was brought prior to the issuance of certificate 44. If it did not, and it is purely a matter of determining judicially whether there is a discrimination of rates against certain sections of the country by the railroads, then the passage of the pending bill would not affect the suit the Senator from Georgia is discussing.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I cannot agree with the argument of the Senator from Oklahoma. In the first place the regulation to which the Senator refers was only to control Federal officials. It could not possibly restrain the State in its sovereign capacity from bringing a civil action. The regulation only applied to criminal prosecutions, and no criminal prosecutions have been brought. The only proceedings which have been brought in the courts up until now are civil proceedings—the one that was filed by the Department of Justice in Lincoln, Nebr., and the one that was brought in the Supreme Court as a court of original jurisdiction by the State of Georgia. Certainly the effect of the passage of the pending bill would be to permit the very thing against which the State of Georgia complains, and that is a conspiracy to fix rates and to deny competition as between railroads.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. The Senator from Georgia is familiar with the fact, I assume, that the Department of Justice brought a criminal prosecution in Denver, Colo., against certain motor carriers for violating the antitrust laws, and the case was tried before a jury, and the jury found they were not guilty. In other words, it has been tested that a jury in a criminal court may decide upon the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the rate agreed to in the rate bureau, as I understand. Now the Senator has referred to the fact that the passage of the pending bill would oust the courts from jurisdiction.

Mr. RUSSELL. No, I do not say that it would, but in effect, it would make the question moot. It would not withdraw the pending case from the courts, but it would defeat any remedy for the injustices complained of in the suit.

Mr. McMAHON. But let me point out to the Senator that, of course, our courts are designed to interpret rights legally granted by the legislature, that is the Congress. That is what the courts are to determine. There are two conflicting basic principles which the legislature, it seems to me, has to determine, that is as to whether power shall be conferred on rate bureaus to fix rates subject to the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, or whether the Department of Justice shall try out the reasonableness of rates before criminal juries all over the country. That creates a very definite problem of policy, not for the Supreme Court, but for the Congress of the United States.

I may say to the Senator that it seems to me one thing which the opponents of the bill overlook is the impossibility of operating an integrated transportation system in this country if every time the rate bureaus act they are to be subjected to being haled before a jury in a criminal case brought by the Antitrust Division. I say that in that way we cannot operate an integrated transportation system, which we must have. I suppose the Senator is familiar with the views of Mr. Joseph B. Eastman, the great Interstate Commerce Commissioner.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have read Mr. Eastman's statements in connection with this legislation.

Mr. McMAHON. It is a fact—and I do not think we should overlook it—that everyone who has had any intimate connection with the railroads of the country in a regulatory capacity, whether it has been Joe Eastman, Monroe Johnson, or Commissioner Aitchison, who testified in favor of the bill, has uniformly stated that the railroads of the United States cannot be operated without rate bureaus. They cannot be operated without agreements for the sharing of the proceeds from a through shipment of freight from say, the East Coast to California.

Mr. RUSSELL. No one has tried to enjoin such an agreement as that.

Mr. McMAHON. The trouble is that if we pursue the policy which the Department of Justice is trying to pursue, the railroads will find it impossible to proceed under their present way of doing business.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I shall be glad to yield in a moment.

The Senator from Connecticut was one of the ranking officials of the Department of Justice for a number of years, and, of course, has intimate familiarity with all the cases which have been brought by the Department dealing with this question. But I do not believe that the question of distribution of funds as between connecting carriers is in the slightest degree involved in either one of these cases; and I doubt if it has been involved in any criminal prosecution which has taken place. We are not complaining, and the Department of Justice is not complaining, about any distribution between connecting carriers. However, I assert that there should be some competition between parallel lines of railroads or freight forwarders. Despite the fact that it is commonly asserted that the railroads are a monopoly, and despite the fact that they have interlocking directorates, and are largely controlled by J. P. Morgan & Co. and Kuhn, Loeb & Co., who for a long period of time have furnished 88 percent of the finances required to keep them in operation, the railroads are not a monopoly in the sense that the gas company in Washington, D. C., is a monopoly. In the case of two lines which operate, let us say, between the city of Washington D. C., and the city of Chicago, there should be some competition in freight rates. Otherwise the public is absolutely helpless. If there is no competition between lines operating between the same points and traversing practically the same territory, the whole idea of competition falls. The kind of case in which the Department of Justice is interested—and certainly the kind of case which the State of Georgia has in mind—is a conspiracy between competing lines with interlocking directorates to fix rates. Such lines will not let the benefits of competition flow to the consumer.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Following up the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McMAHON], was not the Interstate Commerce Commission established on the theory of regulating rates so as to allow reasonable competition between competing groups of carriers and between competing carriers? I refer to competition which would not lead to bankruptcy. I do not mean such devastating competition as would result in nationalization of the railroads. It seems to me that this bill represents the logical carrying out of that theory.

Mr. RUSSELL. It may appear so to the Senator from Massachusetts; but to me it seems that it is proposed to delegate to the American Association of Railroads and the freight bureaus what should be the functions of a governmental agency. Under the terms of the bill the Interstate Commerce Commission would exercise only the sketchiest sort of actual jurisdiction overy negotiations to fix rates.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Following the Senator's logic, is not his remedy against the laws which created the Interstate Commerce Commission and under which it is operating? If those laws are not sound, if the Commission is not a proper regulatory body, his complaint lies against the law, and not against agreements which would permit railroads to operate without such competition as would lead to nationalization. If there cannot be some agreements of this kind, how else can we avoid nationalization of the railroads?

Mr. RUSSELL. In my opinion the advocates of the Bulwinkle-Reed bill are driving toward nationalization of the railroads much more rapidly than are those who oppose it. If we freeze this inequitable system of freight rates on the people of the United States and say to the great West and South, "You shall never have any relief from these discriminatory rates," after a while the result will be the nationalization of the railroads. The American people will not forever tolerate unfairness. They will not forever tolerate discrimination. They will eventually demand that the Government take over the railroads. In my opinion the passage of this bill would bring about the nationalization of the railroads of the country much more rapidly than would free competition within the sphere of the law which created the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Does not everything the Senator has just said go to the point I am trying to make? The Senator believes that the laws under which the Interstate Commerce Commission is established are inadequate, or that the present administration of the Commission is inadequate.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think the present Interstate Commerce Commission has recently shown some appreciation of its proper functions, duties, and responsibilities. Certainly I would not wish to say that I approve of all that the Interstate Commerce Commission has ever done, or that I would condone its failure to do the things that it has refused to do.

The bill goes further than the present law, and undertakes to establish a quasi-governmental agency within the American Association of Railroads, which has no responsibility save to those who finance the railroads and their stockholders. The pending bill would permit the Interstate Commerce Commission largely to escape the responsibility which belongs to it, and which it has often shown no great zeal or enthusiasm to assume.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield further to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. If what the Senator says is correct, how could such an agreement be approved under the provision found in lines 15 to 21 on page 2 of the bill? If the Interstate Commerce Commission is doing its duty, it cannot approve agreements such as the Senator has just described.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I regret to appear critical of the Interstate Commerce Commission; but in my opinion the Interstate Commerce Commission is like a great many other Government agencies, both State and Federal. When an agency is newly created, it enters upon its task with the zeal of a crusader. After a certain length of time it becomes fat and lazy. In my opinion the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission is seeking to secure the passage of this bill is an indication that it does not wish to go to the trouble it should assume to meet its full responsibility to the American people.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. In all matters of legislation, personalities are probably odious.

Mr. RUSSELL. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts is not going to name the individual members of the Interstate Commerce Commission and ask me to pass upon them.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Let me say to the Senator from Georgia that the Senator from Massachusetts has the highest personal regard for the actions and personality for the late Joseph B. Eastman. Certainly if his theories as to the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission were followed there would be no inherent danger to the American people by supplementing the present laws relating to the Interstate Commerce Commission with the proposed act. Is not that so?

Mr. RUSSELL. I believe the Senator from Massachusetts referred to the late Joseph B. Eastman; did he not?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Eastman would not be present to assist in carrying out this program.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let me ask the Senator from Georgia what has happened to the railroads, which are theoretically, if not actually, still under the antitrust laws, which brings about the necessity for this legislation? What disadvantage have they suffered so far that is unfair to them and that makes it so necessary to pass this piece of legislation lifting them out from under the antitrust laws and putting them on an island of safety as compared with other organized industries in the United States which might have a claim for the same sort of sympathy? I myself do not recall that anything has happened to the railroads which brings about any necessity to pass a bill of this kind. Can the Senator tell me what has happened to them that makes it so important that we pass this bill and that makes them so anxious regarding it?

Mr. RUSSELL. I think it is because of the two lawsuits which have been mentioned.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. In other words, there was a lawsuit attacking the validity of the unfair action of the Interstate Commerce Commission in determining rates applicable to certain great sections of the country, and this legislation was originally introduced in order to get in ahead of the decision of the United States Supreme Court?

Mr. RUSSELL. Not only the decision of the United States Supreme Court, but of the District Court for Nebraska in which a case is pending which would give some measure of equality and relief to the people of the West who have labored under this burden for the past 60 years.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct. For many years the antitrust laws have applied to railroads just as they have applied to every other industry. Then suddenly a lawsuit has been brought involving the southeastern section of the United States and the middle section, as is indicated by the lawsuit in Nebraska; whereupon this legislation is introduced and is urged and reported in order to obviate the effect of a decision of the United States Supreme Court.

Mr. RUSSELL. I believe the Senator from Kentucky was not present when I stated earlier in the day that every time the railroads and their freight bureaus felt the breath of justice blowing warmly upon their necks they endeavored to rush through the Bulwinkle bill in order to get out from under possible prosecution by the Department of Justice.

Mr. BARKLEY. It was precipitated by two lawsuits seeking to bring justice to certain sections of the United States.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Kentucky has put his finger on the point.

Mr. MOORE rose.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield first to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. MOORE. In answer to the question of the Senator from Kentucky, these bureaus have been part of the system of rate making under the growing process which has been approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission for 40 or 50 years, and not until 2 years ago was there any question of whether they were violating the antitrust law.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think the Senator from Oklahoma is wholly in error. I tried to get into the debate a while ago, but the Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED] had the floor at the time and was answering some question and did not yield to me. It is a far cry from the freight bureau that is fixing rates on a local level somewhere in the country where there is some measure of competition between railroads and where the Interstate Commerce Commission has jurisdiction which has existed for the years which the Senator has mentioned to the day when the Association of American Railroads was formed. When that association was formed in Washington it set itself up as a supergovernment and made all the members of the association agree that no matter would even be submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission until it had been first approved by the directors of the Association of American Railroads. That made a great difference. A member could not even get his case before the Interstate Commerce Commission. It might be said that he could appeal it to the Interstate Commerce Commission in spite of the association. Evidence has been produced in the trial of the two cases referred to showing that men wanted to do it, but it was said, "There will be no freight forwarded over our lines. We shall not be able to get our finances from J. P. Morgan & Co., Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and the other interests which finance the railroads. We will be helpless and prostrate." I think that is the reason why the antitrust laws have been invoked only in the past few years. Of course there has been discrimination against sections. People from the West and South have for years protested against it. They have cried out for equality. The steps which have been taken have been a long and painful labor.

The Southern Governors' Association started, I think, in 1930 or 1931, filing petitions with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

There are those who say that I am critical of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but I must say that speed in the determination of cases has not been one of the great virtues of the Interstate Commerce Commission, it matters not who might be presiding over it. Cases can pend before the Interstate Commerce Commission for years. The Commission itself, since 1887, has been issuing orders to the railroads in an effort to bring about a uniform freight classification. Senators talk here about there being literally trillions of rates filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission; and that is a fact. Why do they exist? It is because the railroads and the freight bureaus have built them up. The Interstate Commerce Commission has in the abstract condemned the system because it is so involved and complicated that no person can understand it unless he devotes a lifetime of study to it. Starting in 1887 and periodically thereafter, the Interstate Commerce Commission has ordered the railroads to make a uniform classification of freight, but despite that fact, in the good year of 1947, 60 years later, there still are trillions of rates which the advocates of this bill urge as a reason why the bill should be enacted. If the railroads had established the uniform system there would not be trillions of rates and the whole system would be simpler.

Mr. MOORE. The Senator does not mean that he would divest the Interstate Commerce Commission of the power of fixing rates, does he?

Mr. RUSSELL. I would not divest them; neither would I permit them to escape their responsibility to the American people through the passage of this bill.

Mr. MOORE. The Senator knows also that the Department of Justice is always welcome to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission, where the jurisdiction rests, and make a complaint?

Mr. RUSSELL. Oh, yes. I understand that in this bill there is a pious line written which provides that the Attorney General shall be notified before any of these cartels are approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission. But the Attorney General is supposed to prosecute in the courts, and he is taking that course, and now here is a bill to try to relegate him to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MOORE. The Senator is not advocating, is he, that the Department of Justice should assume the authority or the competency to determine the fairness of rates? In other words, the Senator would not divide the jurisdiction between the Department of Justice and the Interstate Commerce Commission, would he?

Mr. RUSSELL. I would not. But there still is a difference between a violation of the antitrust laws and the fixing of a rate by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. President, I assert that it would be just as logical to pass a law saying that the automobile manufacturers of this country should be permitted to get together to fix prices and cartelize themselves in this country as it would be to pass this bill placing such power in railroads and their satellites.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator from Georgia has heard the name of Mr. Norman brought into the discussion in connection with the Southern Governors' law case. The Southern Governors organized in approximately 1931 or 1932. That particular case was started in 1939. That was more than 8 years ago. I might say that if it had not been for the action of the governors of the Southern States, with the aid of their contingent funds and the generosity of the legislatures of those States in appropriating huge sums of money, I doubt that there would have been any relief for the South whatsoever. Year after year, governor after governor used his contingent fund and legislative appropriations, and they were able to hire experts, including Mr. Norman and others, and it was only after 8 years of toil and fight and heavy expenditures that any relief whatever was obtained.

Mr. RUSSELL. I thank the Senator from South Carolina for his suggestion. I want to say that when we consider the efforts of the Interstate Commerce Commission to get a uniform classification, which have extended over 60 years, I congratulate the Governors on getting action in 8 years.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. I should like to point out that in the case of automobile companies or cement companies or any other kind of companies I can think of at the moment there is no special governmental appeal.

Mr. RUSSELL. I thought of that as soon as I drew the analogy. Suppose we bring the radio stations in. Suppose we pass a bill which would waive the antitrust laws as to radio interests and permit them to conspire as to which stations shall handle advertising, which station is to be denied the right to take specific programs and which should have a right, among the chains, to have a schedule of distributing programs and advertising so that they could put all the independents out of business and clutter the air waves with programs not fit and proper for the American people. That is a clear analogy, because in that case there is a Federal agency which undertakes to regulate the radio stations of the United States.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I do not think that analogy will stand up.

Mr. RUSSELL. I did not expect the Senator from Connecticut to agree with me as to that.

Mr. McMAHON. I do not think it will stand up, because, after all, the radio chains are individual operating units. They compete, during the same hours of the day and night, with the other chains. There is no intercommunication that is required—no transshipment of freight or transshipment of passengers, such as in the case of the railroad systems.

Does the Senator from Georgia think the railroad systems of the country could be operated without rate bureaus?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not know whether they could or not.

Mr. McMAHON. I am not an expert on transportation, and I went to the committee and listened to the testimony on this bill with an absolutely open mind; but I say to the Senator that there was not a single witness who appeared before the committee, either a shipper or a railroad man or a customer, who testified other than that the railroad business of the United States could not be conducted without rate bureaus. Even Mr. Purcell, the vice president of the Chesapeake & Ohio, who has been against this bill, stated in his testimony that it would have been impossible to operate the railroads of the United States without rate bureaus. That was his testimony.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut may intrigue himself with the idea that the railroads could not be run without rate bureaus; but I do not think we should become involved in that question, for I think it has no relationship to the issue which is now before us. No one is undertaking to abolish the rate bureaus. We are simply saying that the railroads should be operated in the same way that other corporations in the United States are operated. Let the railroads function and let them perform the responsibility of arriving at freight rates, but let us not throw over them a mantle which will protect them from prosecution or from suits under the antitrust laws to which other citizens of the United States are subject.

The Senator keeps referring to the intercommunication or interchange of freight and passengers. I say we are not concerned with the question of what happens when a passenger or a shipment of freight reaches the end of one line and is passed on to another. The issue before us involves primarily competition between the same stations.

Mr. McMAHON. Does not the Senator think that the basic issue is simply whether we are going to have brought in the courts criminal cases in which conspiracies to fix rates will be alleged, and whether we are going to have such cases tried before criminal juries or by Federal judges in various places in the United States, or whether we are going to vest the responsibility in the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is the body the Congress has set up to regulate the railroads? There is the choice, it seems to me. I think it can be stated quite clearly.

This bill provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission must approve every agreement which is made. The Attorney General will have the right to complain about it, and anyone else will have the right to complain about it; but the responsibility will be fixed in that way. It is for the Congress to fix that responsibility. The Congress can either do it in that way or it can vest that responsibility in the Office of the Attorney General. But I think it would be a very unscientific way of making rates to call upon a jury of farmers in Nebraska, let us say, to decide in their judgment as to the reasonableness of a rate that had been fixed in a rate bureau. As a practical matter, I say the railroads cannot be operated in that way.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut is entitled to his own opinion, of course. Of course, I could view the proposed legislation perhaps from a somewhat different angle if I were so fortunate as to live in the official territory which has benefited all these years from the rate machinery which has had the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. If I lived in a great industrial State where the industries were controlled in some degree, at least, by those who have financed the railroads, and who are seeking that protection at the expense of the rest of the country, perhaps I would talk about criminal prosecutions, although the Senator knows that the cases involved in this instance are civil cases, not criminal cases. The two groups of cases as to which the railroads are trying by means of the enactment of this measure to escape responsibility of a judgment are the civil cases brought at Lincoln, Nebr., and the civil cases filed in the Supreme Court of the State of Georgia.

Of course, no one can blame the State of Connecticut and other States which long have occupied a favored position in the transportation system in this country—a position that has brought them great wealth and great industrial development—for attempting to hold the advantage they have possessed for so long.

But, Mr. President, certainly those of us who have suffered and have been impoverished under the same system which the Senator from Connecticut defends cannot be expected to sit here quietly and see the railroads and their agencies and their appurtenances escape the consequences of violating the antitrust laws, when we know the result will be to keep us down in the same unfortunate and inferior position, in respect to the economic contest across this country, that we have struggled against for so many years.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. A moment ago the Senator referred to the situation in the radio industry; but he need not confine himself to that, because the Communications Commission has jurisdiction over the telephone and telegraph companies and all other communications companies that are engaged in interstate commerce. Similarly, would it not be just as logical to lift all conspiracies in the business world out from the application of the antitrust laws, simply because there is a Federal Trade Commission? Some years ago the Congress established the Federal Trade Commission as a Federal agency to handle all complaints in the economic and business and industrial world, so as to keep unchoked the channels of commerce and to keep them free from the long delays involved by Federal court litigation.

So if we were to lift the railroads out from under the application of the antitrust laws, and were to put them under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, should we not also lift the telephone and telegraph and wireless companies and all other communications companies out from under the antitrust laws and place them under the control of the Communications Commission, and in the same way should we not place all business and industrial concerns under the control of the Federal Trade Commission, and thus remove them from the application of the antitrust laws? In that way, all those matters would be left to those Commissions for determination, although none of them are agencies for the enforcement of the antitrust laws.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky is most persuasive, and he has illustrated the matter much better than I did. The only thing I fear is that the forces that are back of this bill might seize on the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky and attempt to strike down what will remain of the antitrust laws after the Bulwinkle bill is passed, if it is passed.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate the suggestion, but I do not think the companies will use any suggestion which comes from me as a means of moving to strike down the antitrust laws and to vest control in those fields in the Federal Trade Commission, the Communications Commission, the Civil Aeronautics Board, or any other commission or agency which has to do with such operations in the United States.

Mr. RUSSELL. Of course, Mr. President, the argument which has been made by the Senator from Kentucky is unanswerable.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. Inasmuch as the Senator from Kentucky has referred to the Civil Aeronautics Board, I should like to say that the Civil Aeronautics Act, which was passed by Congress in 1938, contains a provision which is directly in point with what is sought to be done by the measure now before us. In 1938, in section 412 of that act, the Congress stated that the Civil Aeronautics Board, the regulatory body, is authorized to approve agreements between common carriers by air affecting air transportation, if such agreements are not found to be inconsistent with the public interest. That is exactly in line with what this bill proposes to do in respect to interstate commerce by rail.

Mr. BARKLEY. But it does not lift the airline companies out from under the operation of the antitrust laws if they form combinations in violation of the antitrust laws.

Mr. McMAHON. Yes; it does. Under section 414 of that act (U. S. C. title 49), the parties—that is, the air-line companies—are relieved from the antitrust laws with respect to the carrying out of agreements so approved.

Of course, that is exactly the distinction that I think we should not lose sight of at this time; and it is exactly what the Congress did in 1938, I say to my good friend the Senator from Kentucky, in respect to the air-line companies; and it has worked very well indeed. In aviation there is not nearly the necessity for rate bureaus or conferences that exists in the case of an integrated railroad system.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HAWKES. I should like to address myself to the Senator from Connecticut. The point he has raised, I think, is a very important one, and I am wondering if he realizes that Mr. Truman was a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at that time, and took an important part in drafting the legislation which exempted from the antitrust laws the airplane companies participating in mergers which might have been in violation of the antitrust laws had it not been for that act itself.

Mr. McMAHON. I might answer the Senator in this way: As he knows, I was not fortunate enough to be a Member of the Senate when Mr. Truman was a Senator, except, as I recall, for a period of 15 days; but I think it is vitally important to keep in mind, in considering the proposed legislation, that we are not here to pass out licenses to the railroad companies to do a wrong thing. I think that is the subject of the undue emphasis that is placed on the bill by its opponents. What we are trying to do, as I see it, is to give effect to the national transportation policy which the Congress established in 1938, as I remember. I ask the Senator from Kansas, in what year was the National Transportation Act enacted?

Mr. REED. The original Transportation Act was enacted in 1920.

Mr. McMAHON. I mean the last one.

Mr. REED. In 1940.

Mr. McMAHON. It was in 1940. If we are to give effect to the objectives which are set forth in the National Transportation Act, the only way in which we can do it is to place the responsibility for enforcing the regulation of the railroads in the United States upon the organization which has been set up in the act to perform that function, and that is the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me for a moment more?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. HAWKES. In any number of cases Congress has taken action to permit the doing of things which it considered in the public interest and for doing which it exempted people and corporations from prosecution under the antitrust law. I see on the floor my distinguished friend, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. McFARLAND]. He sponsored and carried through in the Senate, about the time I first became a Member of the Senate, a bill which permitted the merger of the telegraph companies. That was a matter which came under the Federal Communications Commission. He sponsored a bill which permitted the merger of the telegraph companies, and permitted the merger of foreign operations under certain conditions prescribed, because it was considered to be in the public interest to do so.

Section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act permits certain mergers of railroads, which, otherwise, very clearly they never would have been allowed to consummate at all, because they would have been in violation of the antitrust laws, but section 5 permits those mergers when they are approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Those who enter into those mergers are exempted from prosecution.

The proposed section 5 (a), as was very intelligently brought out before the Senate this morning by the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] merely carries that philosophy a step further, because it is deemed to be in the public interest that the railroads should have the privilege of using joint committees and rate-making bureaus, not in coercion and intimidation or in threat, but functioning in such a way that when the matter is finally brought back to the Interstate Commerce Commission, it will be approved.

I have the greatest respect in the world for the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. RUSSELL. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HAWKES. He is one of my very good friends.

Mr. McMAHON. The Senator's regard is not exceeded by my affection and respect for the intellectual integrity and strength of views of the Senator from Georgia on the question we are considering. I am only sorry we cannot find ourselves in agreement.

Mr. RUSSELL. I thank both the Senators for their very kind words. I would feel much better about the situation if we were all together in our view of the proposed legislation. Unfortunately, we do not see it from exactly the same viewpoint.

Mr. HAWKES. I thank the Senator from Georgia for yielding to me. I merely wish to say that in all the hearings I attended—and I attended them very regularly last year, or the year before—everyone seemed to be of the same opinion, that we have the greatest transportation system in the world, and the roads must have the privilege of getting together by means of rate-making bureaus, and defining the vast fabric of rates, in order to continue. In some way it must be ascertained how they can do that and continue doing it without always being suspected of doing the wrong thing, and being subject to prosecution under the antitrust laws. The pending bill was devised from the hearings and from the thoughts and theories and suggestions of almost every faction of those interested.

I thank the Senator from Georgia very much for yielding.

Mr. RUSSELL. I appreciate the contribution made by the Senator.

Mr. President, there are other matters which arose during the course of my statement, questions which were asked me by Senators which I did not answer as fully as I should have, because of my desire to yield to all my colleagues who wished to join in the discussion.

One was a question asked by the Senator from Oklahoma about the wartime relief that was afforded the railroads by exemption from prosecution under the antitrust law. We all know that war is the most wasteful thing of which mankind has any knowledge. All that pertains to war is wasteful. We knew that during the period of the war it was necessary for us to have absolute harmony within the United States, and it was absolutely necessary for us to have complete unity of all our people behind our great effort to protect our civilization. For that reason an order was issued which exempted the railroads and their affiliates from prosecution under the antitrust laws.

I should like to point out what resulted from that. Only a day or so ago I noticed an article in the press to the effect that the Department of Justice was bringing a suit against certain railroads to recover sums running into the millions of dollars, on the ground that Government agencies had been overcharged by the railroads for the transportation of freight during the war.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. Does the Senator understand that in the bill there is no bar to the Department of Justice recovering for the Government any overcharges which may have been made as between customer and owner, as it were?

Mr. RUSSELL. No; I do not believe we can enact an ex post facto law. I was using the practice of exempting the railroads as an illustration, to show that that was done to secure harmony and not because all the agencies of the Government necessarily approved of all the actions of the railroads.

Mr. McMAHON. There is nothing in the bill which would prevent the Government recovering for overcharges.

Mr. RUSSELL. No; we cannot pass an ex post facto law.

Mr. McMAHON. But even for the future. In other words, if the railroads 5 years from now, this bill having become law, should overcharge the Government, charge more than they should charge, there is nothing in the bill which would prevent the Government recovering from the railroads.

Mr. RUSSELL. Of course not. But under the provisions of the bill, all they would have to do would be to run up the overcharge, and treat it as a charge, and the Government of the United States would be helpless to protect itself under the antitrust laws.

Mr. McMAHON. My answer, if I may say so to the Senator, is that if they can engage in such a conspiracy to mulct the Treasury and the people of the United States, they can do it only in conspiracy with the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is the only way in which they can do it.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator upon analysis would see that that statement was very extravagant. It would not necessarily have to be as the result of conspiracy. It could be due to oversight or laxity on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission in refusing to go into the rates submitted to them. The Interstate Commerce Commission itself should go into these matters and control the rates, without leaving it necessarily to a combination of railroads to do so.

Mr. McMAHON. Does not the Senator appreciate that if the Interstate Commerce Commission were to act upon the million rates, or whatever the number is, individually, we would need a bureaucracy which would reach from here to Hawaii and back again—such a bureaucracy as the world has never known?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not agree with that statement. I think the trillions of rates there are in this country are largely the result of the failure of the railroads to conform to the repeated orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission to get a uniform freight classification. The railroads have purposely built up an aura of mystery about the rate structure in the United States, and have kept it so complicated that the average man cannot understand it.

Mr. McMAHON. If I might suggest to the Senator, let us take as an example trap rock, which we will assume originates in New Haven, Conn. A carload of it when shipped to Rowayton, Conn., carries a certain rate, but if it goes 10 miles farther, of course the rate is higher. Let us assume that instead of trap rock, it is a carload of bath tubs. Obviously, on any kind of economic basis, bath tubs should carry a different rate from trap rock. I do not see how the Senator is going to avoid the necessity of setting thousands upon thousands and even millions of different rates. I do not claim to be a transportation expert, but I do not see how it can be avoided.

Mr. RUSSELL. There will undoubtedly be thousands of rates, but the idea is that each railroad has a different classification for the same commodity. That is what produces these trillions of different rates. There has been some progress made in eliminating that, but nothing substantial has been done to comply with the orders for a uniform classification.

Mr. REED. If the Senator from Georgia will yield, I do not think he meant that each railroad had a different classification for the same commodity. There may be a variation in the commodity classifications in the three principal territories.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is exactly what I am complaining about. Of course, they all have the same classification in the State of Connecticut, referring to the illustration used by the Senator from Connecticut. That same classification would not necessarily apply in a shipment of rock or a shipment of bath tubs from Atlanta, Ga., to Savannah, because we are in a different area.

Mr. REED. There are as a matter of fact three different official classifications, the northern, the southern, and the western.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think there are four.

Mr. STEWART. As a matter of fact, there are five.

Mr. REED. I wanted to suggest to the Senator from Georgia, when he was talking about the millions upon millions of dollars the Government was trying to recover from the railroads because of overcharges or unreasonable charges, that the Government took its case to the Interstate Commerce Commission, did it not?

Mr. RUSSELL. I understand now that the proceeding must originate before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. REED. That is the only place to which initial resort can be had. The Interstate Commerce Commission is the only body in the country that can determine the reasonableness of rates, upon which the question of an overcharge must depend. Therefore, even in the instance referred to by the Senator, where there was a mere allegation, the force of which I have no idea, it is necessary for the Government to try the case before the Interstate Commerce Commission, which determines whether there is any worth or validity to it.

Mr. RUSSELL. Oh, yes; I fully appreciate that it is necessary for them to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission on that. But the Government has a right to pursue a matter before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and, if relief is denied, as I understand it they have a right to proceed further with it in the courts. The courts are not excluded from jurisdiction completely. The law requires that the matter first go to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. REED. Where there is a clear case of damage by a railroad, not requiring determination by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the case can go directly to court, but when a finding as to reasonableness is involved, there is only one body in the country that can legally and rightfully say whether a rate is reasonable or unreasonable, and that is the Interstate Commerce Commission. If a suit were filed in court, involving the reasonableness of rates, the court, before it would take full jurisdiction, would require a finding by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, in the course of the discussion here this afternoon there has been considerable comment on the Interstate Commerce Commission. It seems that an effort was made by certain Senators to make it appear that I was being unfairly critical of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I have been critical of the Interstate Commerce Commission in times past, and I have no apology to make for that criticism. I want to pay tribute to the Commission for the decisions they have rendered in the Commodity Rates case, brought by the southern carriers, a decision rendered sometime ago, and the decision on the validity of the class rates, decided by the Supreme Court here within the past few weeks. But, Mr. President, criticism of the Interstate Commerce Commission is nothing new. There have been committees of Congress that have gone into matters of the greatest importance, that have been handled by the Commission, who have rendered very critical reports. I do not have them all at hand now. I know the Congress has not been altogether satisfied with the findings and with the actions of the Interstate Commerce Commission. When the Transportation Act of 1940 was enacted—I think it was in 1940—the Congress set up a special Board that was independent of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and directed that Board to do what the Commission should have done many years before, namely, investigate the question of the cost of transportation, and also to go into the whole problem of the freight structure of the Nation, to ascertain whether or not certain sections of the country were being discriminated against for the benefit of other sections of the country. Congress financed that Board for at least 5 or 6 years, to perform duties that were already incumbent upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, by law, but which the Interstate Commerce Commission had not performed.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. STEWART. As a matter of information, and to supplement the Senator's statement, the Board which was set up by the Transportation Act of 1940 was the Board of Investigation and Research.

Mr. RUSSELL. I had momentarily forgotten the technical name of it.

Mr. STEWART. That was the name of the Board. It was given 4 years of life, as I recall, under the Transportation Act of 1940. A year elapsed before the President made any appointments to the Board, or before the appointments were confirmed, at least. The Board therefore had only about 3 years in which to perform the functions or the duties that were required to be performed by it under the act. The Appropriations Committee refused to appropriate any further money to them, and the Board died after a period of 4 years had elapsed. Their period of active service, including the reorganization period, was less than 3 years. The Board should have been continued for 5 or 6 years, but there were a good many Senators opposed to their continued operation; some of whom are on the floor.

Mr. RUSSELL. The same old issue was here that has been here for so long that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary; that is, as to fairness of the rates in the section of the country from whence a Senator hails. If he hailed from the official territory, he was bitterly opposed to the Board of Investigation and Research being permitted to function, because they were bringing to light information which showed the iniquities of the present set-up, which divides the country into various sections and imposes a higher rate in the West and in the South than it does in the favored official territory. Of course, since I came from the South, one of the least favored sections, I advocated very vigorously that we continue the Board. As I recall, it was defeated by failure to appropriate for the Board.

Mr. STEWART. That is correct. Certainly the Congress had no chance to vote on extending the time. It was useless to make a fight, as a number of Senators knew, but this Board, I may point out to the Senator at this point, started the only real investigation on the cost of transportation that has ever been undertaken. They were making a very careful analysis and study of the freight rate waybill from all sections of the country, over a period of a great many years. That incurred considerable expense not only to certain members of the Board but to the railroads themselves, in furnishing waybills. We published such reports as were completed by the Board of Investigation and Research, which reports are Senate documents that are available today in the document room of the Senate, at least. We were never able to make a complete study of the freight rate cost, as many of us had hoped, and as we would have been able to do, had the Board been allowed to continue for about 2 years longer.

Mr. RUSSELL. I understand, though, that the Board reported, on the basis of the investigation it made, that there was no justification for this time-honored fallacy that it would cost more to transport freight in western and southern regions than it did in official territory. As a matter of fact the Board's investigations disclosed that the railroads could transport freight cheaper in the southern region than they could in official territory, and that in the western region the cost of transportation of freight was only slightly higher than in official territory, and nothing like high enough to justify the extortionate charges for transportation that the people of the West were compelled to assume.

Mr. STEWART. I think the Senator is entirely correct. As I recall, Dr. Ford K. Edwards, an expert connected with the Interstate Commerce Commission, who I believe is still with the Commission, was the first man who discovered that it cost less to operate railroads in the southern territory than in the eastern territory. That is a matter of public record here also. So we have a finding of the expert in the Interstate Commerce Commission to that effect, as well as that of the Board of Investigation and Research.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Interstate Commerce Commission made a similar finding. I wish to join the Senator from Tennessee in paying tribute to the gentleman he named who discovered that fact. We had known that it was a fact, but we were unable to prove for many years that there was nothing to the fallacious conviction that the density of traffic in official territory made transportation costs much lower there than they were in the southern or western territory. The finding of the Interstate Commerce Commission and of the Board of Investigation and Research confirmed what we had long known and contended.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. I rose a few minutes ago to ask the same question that the Senator from Tennessee so ably presented. I might further suggest that it is my recollection from the many meetings which I attended when we endeavored to have additional money appropriated in the Appropriations Committee in the last 2 years to continue the Board of Investigation and Research, that the western discriminations were even greater than the southern, particularly in the Nebraska area.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes. There is no doubt that some of the States in the western regions are laboring under greater discriminations than we are confronted with in the South.

Mr. MAYBANK. The same is also true in California.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, and in the far Western States.

Mr. President, I was discussing the Interstate Commerce Commission and the slowness with which it renders decisions, and the apparent ineptitude it sometimes displays, when we were drawn off into the discussion of freight rates and costs. Any number of committees of Congress have filed reports critical of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Congress has indicated that it did not altogether approve of all the policies of the Interstate Commerce Commission by the amendments which have been passed to various laws which affect the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Senator from Tennessee served as the chairman of a subcommittee of the Special Committee to Study Problems of American Small Business, United States Senate. Last year the Subcommittee on Transportation Program for Small Business submitted a report to the Senate. The committee, after exhaustive hearings, and hearing from hundreds of little shippers over the country, recommended the reorganization of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I wish to read two or three pages from that report. I read as follows:

> For more than 50 years the Interstate Commerce Commission has been the country's principal agency of transportation regulation. It was created with high hopes and expectations that it would wipe out discriminations and excessive charges of rail transportation. Its regulatory control has since been extended over pipe lines, highway carriers, and water carriers. It has been given broad latitude and powers to require that rates and services be just, reasonable, and free from unjust advantage or disadvantage to any person, commodity, or locality.

I interpolate to say that the act of 1940—I believe it was that act—also directed the Interstate Commerce Commission to see that there was no injustice, advantage, or disadvantage to any region of the country. It went further than merely any locality. I continue to read:

> The Commission has enjoyed, in high degree, the confidence and support of Congress and the public. High standards of duty and responsibility have been maintained by its personnel and staff.
> It is of great importance to determine why Commission regulation has fallen so far short of its goals. It would, of course, be unfair to fail to give the Commission credit for its substantial accomplishments. Some of these are the elimination of secret rates, rebating, and rate wars, the achievement of greater stability in the rate structure, and the removal or mitigation of many individual and some regional discriminations. The fact must be faced, however, that the hopes of achieving, through Commission regulation, a sound and efficient transportation system, with a structure of rates fair to all shippers, carriers, localities, and regions, remain largely unfulfilled, and without present prospect of fulfillment.
> Studies of the Board of Investigation and Research—

This is the Board to which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART] adverted, and naturally he was familiar with it because he was the chairman of the subcommittee which made the report. I continue to read:

> Studies of the Board of Investigation and Research pointed out some of the principal weaknesses of Commission regulation.

The following weaknesses are listed:

> The Commission has not investigated transportation from a broad national viewpoint.

Having failed in that duty, Mr. President, now it is proposed to discharge the Commission from the intimate duty which it should assume over these rate structures by merely making the Commission the agency to approve what the private rate-structure agencies, such as the rate bureaus, have gotten together and agreed upon and submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I continue to read:

> It has not acquired expert knowledge of the economy and fitness of the carriers, the efficiency and cost of their several services, the relation of their rates and charges to costs, the effect of rate levels and relationships on commerce.
> It has developed no definite, reliable standards for measuring the justice and reasonableness of rates, or determining fair rate relationships.
> It has accepted the rate structure of railroads and their monopolistic theories of charging what the traffic will bear, wide differences in rate levels, and disregard of cost of service as lawful and proper, except to the extent that complainants are able to prove the contrary. Such proof is extremely difficult in the absence of definite standards of justice and reasonableness. As a result, few basic changes have been made in the rate structure.

Mr. President, the finding of the subcommittee of the Small Business Committee which was undertaking to protect the small-business enterprises of the Nation from monopolistic practices, was that the Commission had accepted the rate structure of railroads and their monopolistic theories of charging what the traffic will bear. They did that, Mr. President, at a time when the railroads were bound by the antitrust laws, and now it is proposed to hand over to the Commission all the power of approval, with the railroads being irresponsible so far as violation of the antitrust laws are concerned.

The criticism continues:

It has followed the case-by-case method of making investigations and decisions. It has considered only the matters brought before it by the parties in these individual cases, and confined its conclusions to the narrow issues presented, leaving largely undetermined the broader interests of the general public.

Its rate proceedings are exceedingly slow, formalized, technical, expensive to the parties, and uncertain of results.

The membership of the Commission is too large. Its work has become burdened with so many miscellaneous duties that its main function of rate regulation has suffered.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of page 33, all of page 34, and down to the end of the paragraph at the top of page 35 of the report of the Transportation Subcommittee to the Special Committee to Study Problems of American Small Business be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

The Board recommended that the Interstate Commerce Commission be reorganized in the interest of greater efficiency. The Board urged that the Commission itself thoroughly study its organization and procedures, with a view to instituting changes and improvements. Specific changes suggested by the Board were that the Commission modify its present slow and formalized procedures, modeled upon those of the courts, and make greater use of informal methods; that, in its formal cases, it makes a greater use of modified procedures already authorized by its rules of practice; that it establish an Appellate Division, as authorized in the 1940 Transportation Act; that it extend the term of office of its chairman to more than 1 year; that it consider the establishment of regional offices dealing with all types of Commission business within the region; that it expand its research activities pertaining to its regulatory work; that it take official notice of all pertinent facts obtainable from its own accumulated knowledge, in deciding matters brought before it; that it make an analytical study of its decisions and reduce to more precise statement the principles of regulation which have evolved; that it include hereafter in its annual reports, statements of the principles of regulation it has developed.

The Commission has not acted upon these recommendations or indicated any intention of reorganizing. Earlier efforts for reorganization likewise failed. In 1934, Federal Coordinator of Transportation Eastman urged a reorganization [4] by divisions focusing policies into groups small enough to act quickly and decisively. The Commission rejected that proposal, and suggested as a substitute that it be authorized by statute to create one or more appellate divisions. The authority requested was granted in the Transportation Act of 1940, but no appellate division has since been established. In 1939, under the leadership of Chairman Caskie, the Commission finally ordered various changes in its organization, including the assignment of added responsibilities to the chairman, and lengthening the chairman's term of office to 3 years. The changes did not remain long in effect, however, and in 1942 the Commission returned to the old policy of annual rotation of the chairmanship.

There can hardly be room for doubt that a thoroughgoing reorganization of the Commission is long overdue, at least to the extent of placing greater responsibility in the chairman and cutting down formalism and delays. Expeditious, clear-cut action is almost impossible from a group larger than three administrative officials. The time required for consideration and disposition of matters is increased in almost geometrical ratio by the number given responsibility for their execution. Best results are obtained by one executive. No body of 11 men, each with equal executive power and responsibility, can dispose effectively of such large and important affairs as come to the Commission for decision.

The Commission should be directed by the Congress to report its recommendations for its reorganization. Consideration should be given to the recommendations of the Board of Investigation and Research, former Chairman Caskie, and Federal Coordinator Eastman. Reorganization of divisions might be effected along something like the following lines:

1. General policy, coordination, administration, appeals, enforcement (Chairman of the Commission to be head of this Division);
2. Rates, tariffs, suspension, and fourth-section matters;
3. Certificates, permits, construction, acquisition, abandonment;
4. Carrier service, safety;
5. Carrier finance, valuation, consolidations, mergers, statistics, reports, accounts.

This contemplates that the Commission would continue to be, as in fact it always has been, a regulatory and administrative body. The function of establishing legislative policy would remain with Congress. The broad field of economic and technical research, coordination, and promotion of transportation would be primarily the duty of the Federal Transportation Authority, aided by the National Transportation Advisory Council, and by Government agencies dealing with transportation. The Commission, as a regulatory body, would receive the benefits of the research and findings of the Federal Transportation Authority through its official reports and by participation of the Authority and the Public Transportation Counsel in proceedings before the Commission, and by liaison between the Commission and the Authority and the Advisory Council.

Should the Interstate Commerce Commission regulate all modes of transportation? Regulation of all types of carriers by one agency is logically a better means of achieving a coordinated national transportation system than by having each type of transportation regulated by a separate agency. The greatest disadvantages of regulation by one agency are that the agency may become overburdened and unequal to the heavy responsibilities imposed upon it; that regulation may become too slow, expensive, and routinized to accomplish the desired results; that the agency may attempt to force upon the different types of carriers artificial patterns of rates and similarities of regulatory requirements, rather than deal with each carrier according to its inherent advantages.

Proposals have been made that regulation of air carriers, now under the Civil Aeronautics Board, be transferred to the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Board of Investigation and Research, in its Report on Practices and Procedures of Governmental Control, House Document 678, Seventy-eighth Congress, second session, recommended that such transfer be not made at this time, since the Commission has not yet demonstrated its ability to regulate effectively the three modes of transport now under its jurisdiction, and since aviation is a young industry, which has not yet found its full place in the national transportation system, and has many special problems to work out within the industry and in its national and international governmental relations both with reference to commerce and national defense, with which a special agency may be able to deal better than the Commission.

[4] Federal Coordinator of Transportation, Third Report, H. Doc. 89, Seventy-fourth, Cong., 1st sess.; Fourth Report, H. Doc. 394, Seventy-fourth Cong., 2d sess.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, in addition, as I stated a few minutes ago, there is a tendency for regulatory bodies of this nature to come under the spell of the very able advocates who are employed by the regulated corporations. We have seen it in many of our States. Men go to the public service commissions full of zeal and energy and determination to serve the public interests. Six or eight years later they still have the same high integrity; but as a result of the process of attrition they have reached a state of mind in which they no longer look into these questions, but accept what those agencies submit to them in all cases as being facts. That is not unusual.

We must point out further that those who are serving the Interstate Commerce Commission and the State agencies are in many cases not nearly the equal in ability of those who represent the railroads. The Government simply does not pay the general counsel of the Interstate Commerce Commission $50,000, $60,000, or $100,000 a year. It does not pay assistants salaries of $40,000 or $50,000 a year, but the railroads and the vast financial interests are able to pay enormous salaries.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. HAWKES. Does the Senator know of any way to prevent a Government agency, the courts, or any of the representatives of the people, in Congress or elsewhere, from coming under the spell of those able individuals?

Mr. RUSSELL. No; I do not know of any way that we can completely avoid their hypnotic powers; but I am urging the Senate to build up its resistance in order that we may be able to confront the situation so far as this piece of legislation is concerned.

Mr. HAWKES. Does the Senator know of any Government agency that is better qualified to handle itself under the spell of those able advocates than is the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not. I am not damning or condemning the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think it has men of integrity in its employ. However, I do not believe that it has fully discharged all of its duties and responsibilities to the American people. As a Government agency, I think it is a great deal better than many other agencies I could name.

Mr. HAWKES. I thank the Senator.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, as has been indicated, the immediate occasion for this bill was, in my opinion, the two cases to which reference has been made, one being the western case, which is pending at Lincoln, Nebr. I should like to make the record complete on this bill. It may be that the report which is going the rounds to the effect that there is an adequate vote to pass it overwhelmingly in the Senate is correct. I certainly know of no facts which would permit me to challenge that statement at this time. However, I believe that Senators opposing the bill have the responsibility of making a record in the hope that the President will see fit to veto the bill when it is presented to him. We shall then have something to stand on if and when we have the odds on our side so far as numbers are concerned. Therefore, I wish to read a portion of the statement of the assistant district attorney, Mr. Berge, in charge of the Government's case at Lincoln, Nebr. I shall read a few brief excerpts from the statement he made to the court in presenting the case:

The Government charges that through such agreements and understandings the defendants have eliminated competition between railroads by concertedly fixing noncompetitive freight rates and passenger fares and by agreeing upon uniform and noncompetitive train schedules, service, and facilities. The elimination of competition in the fashion charged restrains trade and commerce in transportation by destroying the freedom of individual carriers to compete for business in the American tradition of free enterprise, sustained by the faith that progress and public good are better served by competition than by restrictive agreements among competitors.

I read another brief paragraph from this statement:

The Government also charges that alliances have been formed by the defendants with major industrial groups for the purpose of eliminating competitive influences in both transportation and industry.

Mr. President, I hope that Senators, particularly those from the Western States which will be affected by the progress of this litigation, will catch the full significance of that charge. We all know that it is true. There is an interlocking of directorates and a community of interest between those owning the railroads and those owning great industries, which can eliminate competitive influences, not only in transportation, but in industry. Through this power they can control the destiny of a State or section of the country by preventing industrial progress.

The statement further says:

Its most serious consequence is the restriction of economic opportunity, because monopoly cannot encompass all aspects of the economy save under a collective form of government. It stands solitary against the advancing tide of progress, while the waves of change break against and around it. Its ability to protect its own market is more or less limited by the pressures of the free economy around it; and to that extent it grudgingly tolerates only such changes as are necessary to its own preservation. The power to control transportation is in a large measure the power to control the location and the competitive success or failure of all industry. Power to control transportation, when allied with monopoly power in other industries, is the power to eliminate free enterprise from large segments of the economy and to arrest the normal economic development of various sections of the country.

Mr. President, there can be little doubt that the West and South have much in common in connection with this legislation. They are the areas which have suffered from the discrimination which will be perpetuated if the pending bill should become law.

I wish to make a brief reference to the Georgia case, it being the other case which the proposed legislation would circumvent. It would not deny the courts the right of determination of the issue presented in the case, but it would prevent the courts from issuing judgments which would control such discriminations in the future.

I wish to read from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the State of Georgia, complainant, against Pennsylvania Railroad Co.:

The essence of the complaint is a charge of a conspiracy among the defendants in restraint of trade and commerce among the States. It alleges that they have fixed arbitrary and noncompetitive rates and charges for transportation of freight by railroad to and from Georgia so as to prefer the ports of other States over the ports of Georgia. It charges that some 60 rate bureaus, committees, conferences, associations, and other private rate-fixing agencies have been utilized by defendants to fix these rates; that no road can change joint through rates without the approval of these private agencies; that this private rate-fixing machinery which is not sanctioned by the Interstate Commerce Act and which is prohibited by the antitrust acts has put the effective control of rates to and from Georgia in the hands of the defendants. The complaint alleges that these practices in purpose and effect give manufacturers, sellers, and other shippers in the North an advantage over manufacturers, shippers, and others in Georgia. It alleges that the rates so fixed are approximately 39 percent higher than the rates and charges for transportation of like commodities for like distances between points in the North. It alleges that the defendants who have lines wholly or principally in the South are generally dominated and coerced by the defendants who have northern roads and therefore that even when the southern defendants desire, they cannot publish joint through rates between Georgia and the North when the northern carriers refuse to join in such rates.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the paragraph appearing on pages 4 and 5 of this decision printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BALDWIN in the chair). Without objection, the request is granted.

The matter appearing on pages 4 and 5 of the decision referred to is as follows:

Here Georgia asserts rights based on the antitrust laws. The fact that the United States may bring criminal prosecutions or suits for injunctions under those laws does not mean that Georgia may not maintain the present suit. As we have seen, Georgia sues as a proprietor to redress wrongs suffered by it as the owner of a railroad and as the owner and operator of various public institutions. Georgia, suing for her own injuries, is a "person" within the meaning of section 16 of the Clayton Act; she is authorized to maintain suits to restrain violations of the antitrust laws or to recover damages by reason thereof. Georgia v. Evans (316 U. S. 159.) But Georgia is not confined to suits designed to protect only her proprietary interests. The rights which Georgia asserts, parens patriae, are those arising from an alleged conspiracy of private persons whose price-fixing scheme, it is said, has injured the economy of Georgia. Those rights are of course based on Federal laws. The enforcement of the criminal sanctions of these acts has been entrusted exclusively to the Federal Government. See Georgia v. Evans, supra, page 162. But when it came to other sanctions Congress followed a different course and authorized civil suits not only by the United States but by other persons as well. And we find no indication that, when Congress fashioned those civil remedies, it restricted the States to suits to protect their proprietary interests. Suits by a State, parens patriae, have long been recognized. There is no apparent reason why those suits should be excluded from the purview of the antitrust acts.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I want to read the conclusion of the court in the Georgia case with regard to whether a cause of action lies. I submit that it should convince any fair-minded man that the State of Georgia had a cause of action in the case which the courts should be permitted to determine, without the Congress rushing in to usurp the prerogatives of the court and to empower these agencies to escape the consequences of their misdeeds. The conclusion of the court is as follows:

If the allegations of the bill are taken as true, the economy of Georgia and the welfare of her citizens have seriously suffered as the result of this alleged conspiracy. Discriminatory rates are but one form of trade barriers. They may cause a blight no less serious than the spread of noxious gas over the land or the deposit of sewage in the streams. They may affect the prosperity and welfare of a State as profoundly as any division of waters from the rivers. They may stifle, impede, or cripple old industries and prevent the establishment of new ones. They may arrest the development of a State or put it at a decided disadvantage in competitive markets. Such a charge at least equals in gravity the one which Pennsylvania and Ohio had with West Virginia over the curtailment of the flow of natural gas from the West Virginia fields. They are substitute fuels to which the economy of a States might be adjusted. But the discriminatory rates fastened on a region have a more permanent and insiduous quality. Georgia as a representative of the public is complaining of a wrong, which is proven, limits the opportunities of her people, shackles her industries, retards her development, and relegates her to an inferior economic position among her sister States. These are matters of grave public concern in which Georgia has an interest apart from that of particular individuals who may be affected, Georgia's interest is not remote; it is immediate. If we denied Georgia as parens patriae the right to invoke the original jurisdiction of the Court in a matter of that gravity, we would whittle the concept of justiciability down to the stature of minor or conventional controversies. There is no warrant for such a restriction.

Mr. President, I read that statement from the decision of the Supreme Court in the Georgia case and I read from the statement that was made in presenting the Lincoln, Nebr., case in order that the Congress might be fully aware of the seriousness of the proposal here made that we invade the prerogatives of the Court and snatch from it these two cases which are of such vital importance to large segments of the population of this Nation.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. STEWART. I have been present on the floor during perhaps the greater portion of the Senator's very fine address, but I did not hear him express an opinion as to the legal effect or result of the passage of this bill. I anticipated that he would say that it superseded pending litigation or would make it unnecessary to pursue it further.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think it would make absolutely moot any decision that the courts might hand down. The passage of this bill would cut the heart out of the cause of action in the Nebraska case and in the Georgia case.

Mr. STEWART. In other words, passing this legislation would make it possible to do the very thing which is challenged by the State of Georgia?

Mr. RUSSELL. It sanctions and legalizes the very acts complained of in both of those cases.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. If it would not have that effect, why should the proponents be pressing the legislation so vigorously?

Mr. RUSSELL. Of course, the Senator from Arizona is exactly correct. That is the very reason for this legislation. It is to permit the railroads to be exempt from antitrust laws and to escape the consequences with respect to these two cases. That is the immediate reason. But the long-range object is to continue the discrimination against the West and South in the rate structure of this Nation. It would keep us ground down into the earth without any opportunity of equality in this country or opportunity to secure that distribution of industries over an entire Nation that we must have if our whole economy is ever to enjoy to the fullest degree the benefits of our free Government.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. HAWKES. I know that the Senator does not want to state anything that is inaccurate in connection with the bill. If there were anything in the bill that would do what the Senator says would be done by its passage, I should not be for it. If this bill would permit conspiracies, intimidation, and coercion, which I understand are the basis of the suit of the State of Georgia, then I should not be in favor of it at all. But, as I understand the bill, it will prescribe a method and a way by which the railroads can meet in joint rate-making bureaus and conferences to establish a rate structure. I assume that that rate structure will be in keeping with equity and justice. It has to be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission before it can become effective; and unless we have confidence in the Interstate Commerce Commission's not approving inequitable rates which discriminate unfairly against communities and States, unless we have confidence that the Interstate Commerce Commission will not tolerate or approve anything in the nature of coercion, threat, and intimidation, we should get rid of the agency entirely and try to find some other way to do this thing. I do not know how much time the Senator from Georgia spent in the hearings a year or so ago when I was present, but again I say what I said a while ago on the Senate floor, that everyone at the hearings admitted that there had to be some way to enable the railroads to collaborate, to get together to establish the rate structure of the Nation. While there was criticism from the Department of Justice, the overwhelming opinion of the Nation was in favor of arranging the situation so that the railroads would have the right to get together and to discuss these questions in the public interest and then require the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission of whatever was done. I may say to the Senator from Georgia that at no time was there a suggestion in the hearings, when I was present, of any other way of handling this very complicated and important question of the making of rates.

I have such a wholesome respect, in addition to a deep personal affection, for the Senator from Georgia that I wish him to know that if I believed that this bill would place in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission the power and right to permit coercion and intimidation and threats such as are the basis of the suit of the State of Georgia, if I am not mistaken, then I could not for a moment be in favor of the bill; but after studying the matter and listening to the hearings, it is my opinion that no such possibility will exist under this bill unless that great governmental agency goes wrong.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I know the sincerity of the Senator from New Jersey, and I am as proud to claim him as a friend as I am any other man I have ever known. But I may say to the Senator that by the very force of the circumstances and the environment in which we have operated we must view this matter from a different position. The Senator from New Jersey has not been so unfortunate as to have felt and have seen the blighting effect of a discriminatory freight rate such as I have felt and have seen in my section of the country for a great many years. I could cite on this floor, for the next few days, illustration after illustration of discrimination against my section of the country in respect to freight rates, as compared with others which obtain within and to official territory, in which the Senator from New Jersey lives. I could show him that in the case of a specific commodity it costs almost twice as much to ship it from Georgia to a place in the West as it costs to ship it from New Jersey or elsewhere in official territory to the same place in the West. We have protested this discrimination and have sought to correct it for many years.

I do not wish to be put in the position of saying that the Interstate Commerce Commission for any ulterior or venal reasons has denied us relief for all these years; but we do know that when, after about 30 or 40 years, we did obtain a slight bit of relief in the class rate cases which were decided a short time ago efforts to set it aside have been made by those who have benefited from the official territory rates.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have been very much interested in what the Senator from New Jersey has said on several occasions in respect to trusting the Interstate Commerce Commission to take action in respect to these various matters. As a matter of fact, is it not true that a great many of these things are done by the railroads among themselves in such a way that they never come before the Interstate Commerce Commission? Perhaps some railroad wishes to put a certain rate into effect itself; and perhaps it would ordinarily do so voluntarily as a good business matter and as a good competitive matter, but it is refused the privilege of doing so by the various committees or rate boards or any number of the myriad of organizations which have been built up to repress and prevent action that otherwise would voluntarily be taken by a railroad itself.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. President, I have on my desk some of the evidence that was adduced at the trial of some of these cases. The Government offered in evidence case after case in which those who were charged with the responsibility of operating some of the weaker railroads had wished to put into effect rates that would have decreased the charges applying in our section of the country, but they could not do so because of the fact that they could not get them approved by the board of directors of the American Association of Railroads, and they were afraid to go along without that approval, for the reason that they feared they would have been denied the right of transshipment of freight and passengers with other lines, and that would have resulted in great loss, if not disaster, to them.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield once more to me, I should like to make a short statement at this point. The Senator has said that small railroads were prevented from taking independent action. That is one thing about which I made it my business to cross question various witnesses who made statements of that kind. However, we did not find one railroad man or anyone else who would say he ever was prevented from taking independent action.

If Senators will read the hearings from beginning to end, they will not find, unless I am mistaken, any witness who testified—certainly no witness so testified while I was there—that he was prevented from taking independent action. Some of the witnesses said they did not feel it was in their interest to take independent action. Of course, that is a matter of judgment. I understand that the Senator means that if they do not consider that it is in their interest, perhaps they will be timid and will not do it. But the fact remains that people in the United States are getting less and less timid all the time.

Under this bill, I think the right to take indepndent action is preserved and safeguarded in every possible way. I think it is up to the railroads to decide whether they wish to take independent action, after the joint meetings and hearings have been held. If they wish to take independent action at that time, but if they are afraid to do so, they have the right to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission and complain about the rates that have been filed, and to request a hearing. Then the Commission can call for a hearing, if it thinks something incorrect has been done, and, if it wishes, it can change what has been done, or even what the Commission itself has previously approved.

So I think this bill amply safeguards the interests of the various groups, including the railroads, so that they can take independent action.

Of course, perfection never will be achieved. If I asked all the Members of the Senate to draw up a plan by which the great railroad system of the United States could proceed to serve the people without cessation and in a better way than they have been served in the past, I doubt whether any group of Senators could draw up, over a period of either months or years, a plan for a better system than the one that is provided for under Senate bill 110.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator from New Jersey has just touched upon an important point. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me to do so, I should like to read to the Senate the safeguards that are written into this bill by the Senate committee. When the bill came to the committee, paragraph (5) of the House bill, which now is our paragraph (6) was not sufficiently strong in regard to the matter of independent action.

Here is the way the Senate committee wrote that paragraph:

(6) The Commission shall not approve under this section any agreement which establishes a procedure for the determination of any matter through joint consideration unless it finds or by condition requires that under the agreement there is or shall be accorded to each party the free and unrestrained right to act contrary to and independently of the initial determination or report, or any subsequent determination or report, arrived at through such procedure, and unless it finds or by condition requires that all carriers of the same class (as defined in paragraph (4) of this section) within the territorial and organizational scope of such agreement shall be eligible to become and remain parties to the agreement upon application and payment of charges applicable to other parties of the same class.

That is what I was interested in calling to the attention of the Senator from New Jersey, and perhaps to the attention of the Senator from Georgia.

The bill also provides that—

Nothing in this section and no approval of any agreement by the Commission under this section shall be so construed as in any manner to remove from the purview of the antitrust laws any restraint upon the right of independent action by means of boycott, duress, or intimidation.

Any carrier or any party who engages in such practices is, by this exception, still subject to the antitrust laws.

Mr. HAWKES. I thank the Senator.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I concede that the facts in regard to the writing of the bill are as stated by the Senator from Kansas. But there is such a thing as a difference in degree of evils. In other words, the bill which has been reported from the committee by the Senator from Kansas is better than the bill which the House of Representatives passed last year, and therefore I have felt that it has been a little unfair to the Senator from Kansas to refer to the bill before us as the Bulwinkle bill. For that reason, I have preferred to refer to it as the Bulwinkle-Reed bill or the bill reported by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED]. The bill is very bad as it is now, but it is better than the original Bulwinkle bill. It contains more safeguards.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Georgia recently referred to a report of the Senate Small Business Committee, of which the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART], I think, was chairman.

Mr. RUSSELL. I did that merely to show that there had been times when other Members of the Congress besides the Senator from Georgia had been critical of the Interstate Commerce Commission, had not thought it was omnipotent and perfect in all its dealings.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Tennessee, who submitted the report to the Senate, gives Mr. C. E. Childe credit for preparing the report.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to make this interposition. Mr. Childe and one or two other experts were with the Senate Small Business Committee for a period of about 2 years. We made a study for possibly longer than that. Mr. Childe was with the Transportation Subcommittee, of which I was chairman.

The report to which the Senator refers was prepared, not from any hearings held, because it was during the war period and we held very few hearings, but we had access to the report of the Board of Investigation and Research, and the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission itself, including the report of Dr. Ford K. Edwards, who, as I stated a moment ago, found that the cost of transportation in the Southern Zone or Territory was cheaper than the Eastern Territory. We had the benefit of the advice of other freight rate and transportation experts in the preparation of the report. Mr. Childe was in the employ of the Small Business Committee for many months, and he is entitled to the credit I give him in the letter to which reference has been made.

Mr. REED. I rose and asked permission to interrupt the Senator from Georgia only for the purpose of quoting from Mr. Childe upon the immediate question, as to the rate bureaus, the Senator from Georgia having brought him forward as a witness.

Mr. RUSSELL. Oh, no, Mr. President, I had not mentioned Mr. Childe. The Senator from Kansas cannot get credit for having testimony coming from the opposite party when he offers a witness, because I had not mentioned Mr. Childe.

Mr. REED. With the permission of the Senator from Georgia, may I read Mr. Childe's testimony to the Senate?

Mr. RUSSELL. Certainly.

Mr. REED. On page 641 of the hearings, Mr. Childe testified as follows:

I think that committees, associations, or conferences, such as have been maintained by the carriers for so many years to consider and take joint action on rates, fares, tariffs, train schedules, and like matters, are a practical necessity. I can conceive of no other way for carriers to provide and maintain joint service and through routes and rates, which give due recognition to the interests of the shippers, carriers, and localities concerned. The opinion of students of transportation, carriers, shippers, and regulatory authorities is practically unanimous, I think, that joint action of carriers through committees and conferences is necessary for the maintenance of reasonable and nondiscriminatory transportation service and rates, as required by the Interstate Commerce Act. Shippers and carriers prefer to negotiate rate and service changes through committees, rather than individually. They wish to have organized procedures for giving information about proposed changes, for discussion of the merits of proposals, and for information about action taken thereon. Regulatory authorities prefer to deal with carriers in groups, rather than singly, to obtain information and carry out instructions.

I thank the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. I wish to have it understood that the witness was offered by the Senator from Kansas, and I shall, before I conclude, offer further statements from Mr. Childe as to the relative cost of transportation within the official territories in the South and in the West.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will yield, I will say to the Senator that practically the very testimony the Senator read appeared in the report of the Small Business Committee, so that we have it on record twice.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I know Mr. Childe, and have a very high regard for him. I am particularly interested in seeing his testimony in the volume before us. I should like to read a little further from the testimony, where he says this:

However, I do not believe there is any necessity or reason for relieving carriers from liability under the antitrust laws.

That is Mr. Childe's testimony, and if I understand correctly, the pending bill does that very thing.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is Mr. Childe's testimony.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield? I should like to submit a little more of the testimony.

Mr. RUSSELL. I want to get along; but I yield.

Mr. REED. Mr. Childe proceeds:

I believe that the rate committees and other conferences of the carriers should be regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission to make them more effective in the public interest and to guard against abuses, and that the antitrust laws should remain in full force and effect, as a protection against any combinations or conspiracies for unlawful purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you there—in one breath you say they should be under the supervision or regulatory power of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and in the next you say they should be subject to prosecution under the Sherman antitrust law. Of course, these two things are inconsistent for the simple reason that if you say they can make an agreement, regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Government could not prosecute them under the Sherman antitrust law unless coercion could be shown.

Mr. CHILDS. That is true. I think prosecutions under the antitrust law should be against collusive practices for unlawful purposes.

With that I agree.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I wish to address myself now for a few minutes to the important aspect of this matter that is involved in invading the functions of the courts at a time when these two important cases are pending and before a decision is reached.

Under our triune form of government, the legislative, the executive and the judicial departments are separate and apart, and each should have an opportunity to operate within its own sphere. The Supreme Court of the United States has taken jurisdiction of the case of the State of Georgia against the railroads and the freight bureaus, and the District Court of the United States in the State of Nebraska has jurisdiction of the western case.

I submit that there is no occasion for the enactment of the proposed law until the courts have determined the issues which are involved in this litigation, and that the Congress should await the determination of those cases in order that we might know how to proceed with legislation of this nature.

We have had no final determination as yet by the Supreme Court. A decision by the Court will at least peel away whatever propaganda there may be on both sides of the question, and will enable us to legislate much more intelligently, and to determine whether or not it is necessary to exempt the railroads from the operation of the antitrust laws.

The railroads have not yet been finally adjudicated as being guilty of a violation of the antitrust law, and the unseemly haste with which this proposed legislation is pushed seems to me a clear confession on the part of the railroads that they have been guilty of violating the antitrust laws, and are asking the Congress to pardon them, instead of letting the executive department doing it, before the judicial branch of the Government has finally found them guilty.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. REED. I am astonished at the Senator from Georgia when he speaks of the haste with which the proposed legislation is being pushed.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have contributed nothing to the haste, I may say to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. REED. We began the investigation 4 years ago. We have taken 4,000 pages of testimony upon this character of legislation. Two volumes of testimony are on every Senator's desk. The committee was in session 33 days last year, and continuously, in an effort to get the opinion of everyone. I think there is no legislation that has come to the Senate during my service of 9 years that has been more thoroughly considered than the bill before us.

Mr. RUSSELL. I did not intend to asperse the diligence of the Senator from Kansas and the other proponents of the bill. There is no question about their diligence. They have probed the question from every angle and in every manner, form, and fashion in which it was possible to examine into it. The railroads themselves have carried the message back to the four corners of the country, spreading all kinds of propaganda as to the need for the legislation. But I say that any effort to reach into the Supreme Court of the United States and the district courts to snatch away from them a cause pending there is unseemly haste. I was not referring to the thoroughness with which the Senator and those associated with him have gone into the matter. I am referring to the general policy or the general principle of going into the courts and taking away from them issues which are there pending. That is an important question for us to determine. I have been one of those who have been very highly critical of the Supreme Court of the United States for its invasion of the legislative field. Time after time, the Supreme Court has practically undertaken to legislate on subjects that are within the sphere of Congress. I do not believe that any Member of the Senate has been any stronger in his criticism of the Court than I have been, but if we continue this business of jumping into the courts, denying them their jurisdiction on matters that are peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the judicial branch of the Government before they have a right to determine them, and thereby aid Congress to legislate intelligently thereon, we are inviting the courts into the legislative field; and no one could criticize them if they took advantage of that invitation.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. MOORE. I should like to remind the Senator from Georgia that I am sure he and I both are in accord on the proposition that the Congress of the United States is the policy-making body of the United States.

Mr. RUSSELL. There is no question about that.

Mr. MOORE. And this is a matter of policy. The mere fact that somebody filed a suit in a court is no reason that I know of why Congress should delay pronouncing its policy with reference to the transportation system.

Mr. RUSSELL. My point is that the Congress has fixed the policy in these matters. We fixed it when we passed the Sherman Act, the Clayton Act, and all the other antitrust laws, and now, at the behest of certain people who are about to be pricked with a pin in the courts, we are changing the policy here, when it is grossly unfair to the people who have been placed at a disadvantage for so many years by this artificial rate structure that the railroads and the freight bureaus have built up over the country.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. I ask the Senator from Georgia if it is not his opinion that Congress could better legislate on this subject after it has the benefit of the opinion of the Supreme Court as to what extent, if at all, the laws have been violated? If they have not been violated there will not be any need of legislation.

Mr. RUSSELL. I agree wholly and completely with the Senator from Arizona. The railroads, before there has been any official determination of the fact that, actually, what they have done up until this date is violative of the antitrust laws, are coming in and asking for not only a raincoat, but a steel helmet that will immunize them from any future violations of the antitrust laws. They are asking for a complete ticket before the Supreme Court has even decided that they have violated the antitrust laws. Of course, the Congress could legislate much more intelligently after the Supreme Court had passed upon this matter, unless we just want to write a blank check to the railroads and say, not only on this matter, but on all others, "You—the railroads and the rate bureaus—are such great people in this country that you are different from any other citizen and every other organization in the land, and you are hereby given by the Congress of the United States a license that will permit you to walk in or out of any court of the land without any responsibility whatever for violation of the antitrust laws."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not also true that, if these cases had gone on through the courts, the rule of reason enunciated by former Chief Justice White would have been applied, and they would not be penalized for an inadvertent or technical violation of the antitrust laws, but only in case of a substantial violation which was really detrimental to the public interest.

Mr. RUSSELL. Instead of pleading guilty in the courts to violating the antitrust laws, the railroads and their satellites have come to the Congress. They have said, "We are guilty; they have got us on the hip, and we want you to give us a pardon before the courts can even write a decision in the case." I submit, Mr. President, we ought at least to wait until the Supreme Court has decided the cases, and that any action of Congress in dealing with the problem prior to that time is premature and will result in divesting the people of the country of a protection to which they are entitled. The transportation system of the country can in fact function after the Supreme Court has decided the case.

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HAWKES. I thank the Senator. The Senator, I know, is very well informed on this subject, and I think we cannot say that railroads instituted the pending legislation because they felt they were going to be prosecuted in the courts. We brought out this morning the fact that an embryonic bill, in principle, was before the Congress 15 months prior to the Nebraska case, I think it was, and 13 months prior to the institution of the Georgia case. That in itself would indicate that somebody in government felt that the railroads should know more about the ground in which they could function with immunity from prosecution, for the purpose of giving transportation and facilitating transportation in the public interest. I merely mention that because to me that is an important thing. If the pending legislation had originated after the antitrust suits at Lincoln, Nebr., and Georgia had been started, I might have taken an entirely different viewpoint regarding the railroads' attitude. I might then have said, let us wait on the decisions.

Mr. RUSSELL. I have great respect for my friend from New Jersey, but I must say that the railroads have manifested much more enthusiasm for this legislation since the filing of the cases, and at each stage along the way of judicial proceeding, there has been a renewed effort to get the bill enacted. I say, Mr. President, that we ought not to enact the bill until the courts have determined the law and the facts in those two cases. We cannot legislate on it intelligently and fairly to all the diverse interests of this great land of ours, until the Supreme Court has determined whether in fact the railroads have violated the law and the rights of the respective parties to the case.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. McFARLAND. Regardless of when the legislation was first introduced, I do not think there is any question that the railroads knew that these cases were in preparation, and that the suits would be filed.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I have a certain matter here which I intend to place in the RECORD somewhere along the line, which will serve to substantiate what the Senator from Arizona has said.

(At this point Mr. RUSSELL yielded to Mr. TAYLOR, who discussed at some length an article written by Vardis Fisher. Mr. TAYLOR'S remarks appear in the RECORD following Mr. RUSSELL'S speech.)

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, there can be no doubt in the mind of any fair-minded person that those parts of the United States which are not within official territory have been the victims of a grave and un-American discrimination in freight rates for many years. Representatives of the South and of the West have protested this discrimination. The Association of Governors of the Southern States have met with the governors of the Western States to seek means to cure the situation. We have appealed to the Interstate Commerce Commission and we have legislated in the Congress. But the fact remains that the South is still laboring under a handicap of almost 20 percent difference in freight rates, and the far West is handicapped to an even greater degree.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. STEWART. I will say to the Senator that I think it has been agreed that the differential is approximately 39 percent.

Mr. RUSSELL. The figure of 39 percent is correct, but I think that was arrived at before the decision of the Supreme Court in the Class Rates case.

Mr. STEWART. That has not yet gone into effect.

Mr. RUSSELL. It has not gone into effect.

Mr. STEWART. I think there is a differential of approximately 11 percent. The western roads have been ordered to lower their charges 10 percent and the eastern roads to raise theirs the same amount.

Mr. RUSSELL. Unless the railroads conclude that they have sufficient support to amend the bill to wipe out the small measure of justice that was poured out by the recent decision of the Supreme Court, after that rate is effective, I think the handicap under which we will be operating in the South will be 20 or 21 percent.

Mr. STEWART. That is correct. As the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] has suggested, the 20 percent is simply an arbitrary amount fixed by the Commission itself because it is within the amount of the so-called discrimination.

I want to ask the Senator this question: Has he studied the matter as to what effect the passage of the so-called Bulwinkle bill might have upon the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Georgia Freight Rate case?

Mr. RUSSELL. No; I have not studied it, but in my opinion, with the exemption of railroads from antitrust laws and with the power vested by this bill in the Association of American Railroads, which is controlled largely by two banking houses in New York, it might wipe out all of the slight step we have made toward justice. They might be able to go back to the decision of the Commodity case, which was handed down by the Interstate Commerce Commission sometime ago, and put us back in the status of citizens of a province or a territory of the United States, instead of being citizens of the United States, because we could not possibly hope to exist in a free economy on a 50 percent discrimination in freight rates.

Mr. STEWART. If I may impose on the Senator's time for a moment I should like to say that the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upheld almost in toto, as I understand, the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which raised rates in the eastern territory 10 percent and lowered rates in the southern territory 10 percent. Am I correct in saying that it would not have been possible had it not been for the provision in the Transportation Act of 1940 which directed the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine whether differences existed, then made those differences unlawful, and directed the Commission to correct the situation?

Mr. RUSSELL. In the long and tortuous path we have pursued in our efforts to be admitted into the Union on a full basis of equality, we have encountered many difficulties. The Commission held for a time that the prohibition in interstate commerce laws as against discriminations between shippers and between ports did not apply to regions.

Finally the Congress of the United States wrote into the law a mandate to the Interstate Commerce Commission to eliminate discriminations as between regions as well as between individuals, shippers, localities, and ports. It was on the strength of that law that finally, some 7 years later, the Supreme Court has decided favorably to the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission which reduced southern and western rates 10 percent and added 10 percent to the rates which obtained within the official territory.

Mr. STEWART. Has the Senator given any thought to the question as to whether the passage of this bill would at least impliedly repeal that portion of the Transportation Act of 1940?

Mr. RUSSELL. To exempt railroads from the application of antitrust laws would permit them practically to nullify the determinations, in my opinion.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further before he starts another subject?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I was interested in what was said between the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Georgia a few moments ago with reference to action, after many long years, to get some relief from discrimination against the southern territory in regard to freight rates. As a matter of fact, it has been mentioned several times this afternoon, particularly by the distinguished Senator from New Jersey that we can always rely on the Interstate Commerce Commission for relief in these matters of which we are complaining. How long, as a matter of fact, did it take the Interstate Commerce Commission to act in the southern freight rate discrimination case? Was it a matter of years?

Mr. RUSSELL. I would not be sure. I think it is stated in the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator will yield, I think it was more than 5 years after the 1940 act was passed. I believe the effort was initiated before the act was actually passed. It was begun after we had written certain words into the Senate version of the Transportation Act in 1939, but it was in 1940 before we were able, through the conference committee, to iron out the differences between the House version and the Senate version.

Mr. RUSSELL. The order of the Commission was made effective on the 1st of January, 1946.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Six years after the Transportation Act of 1940 and 7 or 8 years after Congress began to agitate the matter and to exert some pressure on the committee because of the fear that there would be legislative action regarding the subject.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, in considering what has been stated by the Senator from Alabama we must bear in mind that the full power of the executive branch of the Government, as represented by the President of the United States, the late Franklin D. Roosevelt, had been thrown into this fight for equality as between sections of this Nation in the all-important matter of tariffs on freight and passengers.

In spite of that act of Congress, in spite of all the findings of the various committees, even with the aid of the President of the United States and the power of his office, it took us approximately 40 years ever to bring to a successful culmination even a beginning of the removal of these unfair discriminations in freight rates.

Mr. President, the South and the West are rich in agriculture and in raw materials, in products of the mines and of the forests. The South is very rich in manpower. In the South we have many people, and we have the highest percentage of population on the farms per acre, of any part of the United States. The fact that our sections of the country have not developed into rich areas, into highly industrialized areas, is not due to a lack of ability on the part of the people of the South and the people of the West. We have seen, in my own State of Georgia and in other Southern States, tens of thousands of the young men and young women, who have been educated at the expense of the State, who have been compelled to leave the protection of their homes and the proximity of their loved ones, to move to other sections of the United States. I could spend much time here on the floor of the Senate in naming man after man, who now is a great leader in the fields of finance or industry in the great centers of wealth and population of the United States, who was forced to leave his own home because of the unequal struggle there for economic equality.

Mr. President, we have seen it during the recent war. We saw the State of Idaho, I believe, reduced in population by approximately 20 percent because the people were compelled to move to other areas or did move to other areas to find employment in the war industries, because there was no such employment available to them in Idaho. When those people have left their homes and have gone to States which were not shackled with these discriminatory freight rates, they have been as successful as people have always been in areas which were not so affected by discriminatory freight rates.

Mr. President, we have been the victims of discriminatory practices which have affected us at every turn. We have been the victims of cartels which, through the discriminatory practices which this bill seeks to perpetuate, have held us in economic bondage because we could not wage this unequal struggle against the obstacles which have been inflicted upon us.

Mr. President, reference has been made to the 1940 amendment. That amendment was made in an effort by Congress to bring about a more nearly equal freight-rate structure. We have had the investigations which have been made by the special commission which was ordered by that act. In that investigation the commission found that there were discriminations against the South and the West. The Small Business Subcommittee on Transportation, in its report, has proven conclusively that there has been discrimination against the West and the South in this all-important matter.

Mr. President, I would that Senators, before closing their minds with regard to this matter, would read extracts from the report of a committee appointed in the Seventy-eighth Congress to investigate the effect upon the country of the centralization of heavy industry in the United States. That committee was presided over by the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN]; and its other members were the late Senator Bankhead, of Alabama; former Senator Gillette, of Iowa; former Senator Murdock, of Utah; the late Senator Thomas, of Idaho; former Senator Nye, of North Dakota; and the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON]. The committee submitted one of the most graphic reports I have ever seen made by a committee of Congress. The committee had printed great maps showing the location of various industries, and it filed a very brief report dealing with the reasons for the disparity in the industrial development of the various sections of the United States.

I wish to quote briefly from that report:

> As things stand now, a glance at the Guide—

The Guide being the map which was submitted—> will show clearly that we have no economic balance between the four regions—

Referring to the North, South, East, and West—> and in view of this, to speak of what is so often termed our "national economy" is to indulge in fiction. Ours is a regional economy. Each region has its special problem, stemming from its own unbalanced development, and these crucial problems are not equalized but only slurred when we cover them with the term "national economy."

> Our Southern States were overwhelmingly agricultural, and the West largely a wilderness, when our era of large-scale industrialization began. Our industries, at that time, took root where the proximity of resources to the centers of population made it most profitable and convenient for them. Our major industries have since fought a desperate and ruthless battle, subverting our whole transportation system to their purpose, to deny the West and the South the industries they can support and to which they have every right.

Mr. President, in the bill now before us we are asked to give our blessings to an indefinite prolongation of this subversion of our transportation system to the purpose to deny the West and the South any industrial development.

I read further from the report:

> The West and the South * * * together account for at least 65 percent of our mineral production. But the East—

That is to say, 11 States, according to the division made by the report—> accounted in 1939 for no less than 65 percent of our manufactures. In 1939 the South and West together accounted for only 20 percent of our manufactures, and the East for only 25 percent of our mineral production. In these facts we find an unusual instance of unbalanced and unequal development.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FLANDERS in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. Is it the Senator's hope to conclude this evening?

Mr. RUSSELL. I can do so if the Senator from Maine desires to hold the Senate in session for some time yet. I have not yet reached the end of my remarks. I have before me certain data which I wish to place in the RECORD, and some which I expect to read.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED] is in charge of the bill. I would not wish to make any motion without his approval.

Would the Senator from Kansas be willing——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I prefer that the Senator from Georgia conclude.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I shall undertake to do so. I may say that I have been very generous in yielding to any Senator who has desired to make a statement in the course of my remarks. I have been on the floor all afternoon, and I am somewhat tired. I appreciate the consideration of the Senator from Maine.

I yielded to the Senator from Kansas whenever he sought to interrupt me, and also to the Senator from New Jersey and to all other Senators who sought to make statements during the course of my remarks. I shall undertake to proceed, if the Senator from Kansas insists on it.

I read further, Mr. President, from the report of the committee which was submitted on October 7, 1944:

> As can be seen, the impulse to centralization is basically anticapitalist. It places the interests of a small group above the obvious needs of the whole economic system. In the end, as we have seen it happen in Europe, the apostles of centralization go from economic pressure to freeze out competition in advance, to the more drastic step of controlling the apparatus of government in order to make their power more complete. The result is a system more feudal than capitalistic, with emphasis upon control rather than freedom, authoritarian rather than rational government. Sooner or later the whole order collapses, and those who forgot that they were only a part of a system find that they have in their blindness caused the collapse and ruin of the whole economy and the whole social order.
> The policies, monopolistic and cartellist, which had led Europe to Hitlerism, played a greater part in crippling western industry than we know. In a recent address in Los Angeles, Mr. Wendell Berge, Assistant Attorney General of the United States, said:
> "If a statute were passed which stated that with a few named exceptions of well established firms, no company on the west coast was to be permitted to export to Latin America or to the Far East, and no shipping line would be permitted to carry their products to these places, its effect upon western business would be regarded as catastrophic. This is precisely what the private cartel arrangements did to you. I cannot predict, of course, how important exports to foreign countries may become to you in the future, but I do know that you ought to have a chance to develop this business. Cartel arrangements unknown to you have kept you from doing this in the past. Some of them are keeping you from engaging in this business now."

Mr. President, it has developed that even the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon whom so many Senators wish to rely solely and completely for the control of these monopolistic tendencies and cartels which have been manifested through its freight rate mechanism, has been unaware for many years of some of these agreements.

An article written by Mr. Henry B. Kline, which appeared in Forbes magazine, contains the following statements:

Defenders of the railroads have somewhat better grounds for misgivings about the antitrust attack. The attackers sometimes sound as though they want the railroads to compete like so many merchants. It can't be done. To a very considerable degree, carriers must work in close cooperation simply because they are physically a single system.

It does not follow, however, that group action need reach as far as it does. It has gone too far when the railroads, through rate bureaus, prescribe what degree of restraint shall be imposed on competition among themselves. They are doing that.

The western commissioner agreement, which long remained a secret from even the ICC, undertook to set revenue levels in great regions. Truck lines have cost advantages on short hauls and railroads on long ones, but rail and truck rates more and more become identical at every distance—and the private rate bureaus in the two fields cooperate to keep them so.

These are regulatory functions; they belong only in the ICC. It is intolerable that they should be exercised outside the ICC, even beyond its reach. The rate bureaus defeat regulation very much as the holding companies defeated utility regulation before they were brought under control.

And still the railroads want to make price fixing legal by private bureau. They are pushing all-out for the Bulwinkle bill (H. R. 2536) to exempt them from antitrust prosecution—and have already got it passed by the House. The bill should not become law.

WHOSE OX IS GORED?

But, having condemned an interference which was never more than a threat, how can anyone then face about and propose a decisive trespass against a sovereign American institution more sacred than the ICC—the Supreme Court? The Court has accepted jurisdiction in Georgia's suit. Yet the rate-bureau defenders rush action to beat out the Court by making the matter before it moot. It all depends, apparently, on whose ox is gored, whose sacred cow profaned.

There is sufficient other reason to repudiate the Bulwinkle bill. The record of the rate bureaus is not good enough to warrant legalizing them. Not only that, but the ICC has largely disqualified itself from its proposed power to issue certificates of antitrust exemption.

In 1940 the ICC assumed power over inland waterway carriers. Yet it was after 1940 that the ICC granted the railroads leave to charge higher outbound rates on barge-originated grain than on rail-originated. So the barge operators lost their natural advantage, and the shippers lost the advantage of employing their service.

In short, the Bulwinkle bill would perpetuate evils by placing them under very nominal control by an agency which owes the public an accounting for some of its own deeds. When it can see the way, Congress should amend the Interstate Commerce Act to retain the necessary features of group action and eliminate the bad—also to give the ICC itself more specific instruction on such matters as justice between railroads and barges and railroads and trucks, and between the users of these services. The Bulwinkle bill fills neither need; it would preclude filling one of them.

ARGUMENTS IN HALF-TRUTHS

No one is now competent to say what precise form the solution should take. Now that a clear conflict has developed between the Sherman Act and activities carried on in the outer shadows of the Interstate Commerce Act, no one actually knows what the present law requires. Arguments have been too much in half-truths, too much beside the issue. That applies to both sides.

The problem sorely needs a dispassionate peeling away of propaganda onion-layers, followed by a definition of the law. That is a job which, in the last analysis, only the Supreme Court can do. After it is done, and only then, can Congress legislate wisely and to the point.

Maybe, as Mr. Lyne suggests, there are certain "liberals" who hope the efforts to reach a more tolerable regulation of transportation will leave such chaos that the industry will sink into public ownership. There will be no chaos—readjustments, yes, but less radical ones than the railroads have weathered before. Not only that, but the nationalization fans will get nowhere unless the majority of people, most of whom still prefer private ownership, are driven into their arms.

BILL IS A "RADICAL INTRUDER"

In country after country, in area after area of our own economic system, socialism has been established not because of its enthusiasts, but because partisans of the status quo had succeeded in preserving and enlarging nuisances until the people moved in wrath to destroy them.

The class rate decision and the antitrust tests are ways to correct evils—evolutionary ways—within old and honorable American tradition. The Bulwinkle bill, which would close one road of correction, is the truly radical intruder. Give us enough such things and the larger public may indeed join the socializers for an outcome to fit almost anybody's definition of revolution.

Mr. President, the Supreme Court, in unusually well considered opinions, has held in two recent cases that there was discrimination against the West and the South in the matter of freight rates. I shall read some brief extracts from the more recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Interstate Commerce Commission case and have other parts of it printed in the RECORD.

On page 25 of the decision is a paragraph which every Senator who does not reside in official territory might do well to consider. It reads:

The fact remains that economic development in the South and West has lagged and still lags behind official territory. In 1940 the average annual dollar income per person employed in official territory was $1,988; in Southern, $940—

I ask Senators to note that the average dollar income of every person employed in the Southern Freight Territory, where these high rates obtain, was $940, as compared with $1,988 in official territory—in Southwestern, $1,177; in Western Trunkline, $1,411.

Notice this very significant finding by the Supreme Court:

Official—

"Official" means official territory—the 11 favored States—has 69 percent of all workers engaged in manufacturing in the United States and 29 percent of all workers in extractive industries.

It has, for example, a high concentration in the manufacture of steel and copper products, though less than 4 percent of the iron-ore reserves, and no reserves of metallic copper. The South and West furnish raw materials to official and buy finished products back. They are also dependent to a great extent on the markets for their products in official, which has over 48 percent of the population of the country, 76 percent of the national market for industrial machinery and raw materials, 64 percent for all goods and sources, 62 percent for consumer luxuries, and 53 percent for consumer necessities. Yet the South and West suffer rate handicaps when they seek to reach those markets. One of the many illustrations will suffice.

This illustration has a particular appeal to me:

Cottonseed oil is a basic agricultural commodity. Class rates on it are 7 percent higher from Southern to Official Territory than they are within Official Territory.

Mr. President, if we undertake to ship one of the commodities that we produce on the farms in the Southern States—cottonseed oil—from the Southern Territory to the favored official territory, it costs us 7 percent more than it does to ship that same cottonseed oil or its products within the official territory. Now, listen to this:

If the cottonseed oil is manufactured into oleomargarine, the rates from Southern to official territory are 35 percent higher than the rates within official territory.

In other words, the South is to be denied the right to manufacture their own product of cottonseed into oleomargarine, under this discriminatory rate system. It is not confined, however, to the South, Mr. President. On page 44 of this decision, the Court holds specifically that there is discrimination against the West, and that this discrimination has prejudiced the growth and development of the West. I will read just merely a few lines from page 44 of the decision:

But we are dealing here with a problem of discrimination—a western rate structure which, as compared with the East, is not warranted by territorial conditions and which prejudices the growth and development of the West.

Yet, Mr. President, in view of that finding by the Supreme Court on a matter that was practically of common knowledge to the people of the United States that there was discrimination against the West, which was prejudicing the growth and development of the West, we find certain western Senators supporting the pending bill, which will perpetuate those handicaps.

Mr. President, the sovereign State of Georgia, which I have the honor in part to represent here, has undertaken to correct an injustice to its citizens and the handicap to the operations of its State government through this case in the Supreme Court. I say, Mr. President, that the State of Georgia is entitled to a decision on the merits of that case, which has already been heard by a special master appointed by the court, and who is even now undoubtedly writing his report to submit to the court, that we are entitled to a determination of that case, and, after all these years of being submerged economically, we are entitled to reap whatever benefits may accrue to us in the event that that decision is favorable.

I will submit this question to any Member of the Senate, as to whether or not, if his State that he is undertaking to represent here on the floor of the Senate had a case of this nature pending in the Supreme Court, what would be his feelings if this issue that was so vital to his people as the evidence that I have presented demonstrates this issue to be of such consequence to the future happiness and prosperity of my people, if a proposal were made to strike down any benefits that would accrue from a favorable decision in that case, how he would feel about a bill of this nature.

Mr. President, I do not think that the Congress of the United States—and there has been no final determination that injures the railroads or any of their myriads of satellites and hangerson through this vast structure of freight bureaus, and when there has been no decision that injures them, that the Congress should deny a sovereign State the right for a full and complete determination of these issues by the Supreme Court. Mr. President, if the Senator is not prepared to move a recess, I should suggest the absence of a quorum. I do suggest the absence of a quorum, but I will withhold it if the Senator wishes to recess at this time.

PRICES AND PROFITS VERSUS EARNINGS

During the delivery of Mr. RUSSELL'S speech,

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, I want to read an article from Statewide, a publication in our State of Idaho. The article is written by Mr. Vardis Fisher. Ordinarily we would have an article such as this inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD, but I think it is of sufficient importance to be read into the RECORD in its entirety. It is not too much. Incidentally, I should like to say that Mr. Fisher won the Pulitzer prize for a novel a few years back. He is a very capable writer. He is a Republican, and has very little use for me, generally, but I will say for Mr. Fisher that, whether we agree politically or not, he is an honest man who is not afraid to say what he thinks. He will write on any subject, regardless of whether it is supposed to be taboo or not. This article by Mr. Fisher begins as follows:

Not long ago this columnist went shopping in some of Idaho's big metropolitan centers and came back empty-handed, reflecting that he was one of the "damphool" believers in the system of free enterprise who, about this time last year, was in favor of the complete abandonment of OPA. At that time it was argued that if all controls were taken off, the genius and resourcefulness—yes, and the wisdom—of this country's industrial leaders would soon return us to competition, quality, and fair prices. On the contrary, never in the history of the world has a people been offered such shoddy junk at such outrageous prices.

It is not the fault of the merchants. The retailers are only middlemen who buy from the wholesalers and sell to the public. They are as helpless as you and I. For instance, one of the things I wanted was a chest—usually called a hope chest—for a girl who is reaching that age; and after looking at some boxes, that were only a little better than orange crates, a buyer for a big chain came up and spoke his mind.

He said in effect:

"All around you is junk, a whole floor of it—and I admit it; but it is all we can get. As a matter of fact, we are buying no more stuff like this. We and Sears and Ward have all gone on a buyers' strike. We realize that the manufacturers of furniture are paying twice as much in wages; but even so, their profits are enormous. We'll close our doors before we'll buy any more of the kind of junk you are looking at." That's what he told me, and that was pretty plain speaking.

And I remembered some facts that make nice reading for Josef Stalin. For instance, of the 100 largest corporations in this country, 44 at the present time are defendants in antitrust cases, and 35 others are under Federal investigation—79 out of 100. As Wendell Berge put it, this Nation "is now experiencing the greatest concentration of economic power in its history."

Mr. President, I think the article I am reading has relevancy to the subject under discussion, the question of rates and exemption from the antitrust laws, and what not. Mr. Fisher in the article touches on several phases. I continue to read:

Do you remember the words of Abraham Lincoln? I quote: "I see in the future a crisis approaching that unnerves me and causes me to tremble for the safety of my country. Corporations have been enthroned * * * the money power of the country will endeavor to prolong its reign until all wealth is aggregated in a few hands and the Republic is destroyed * * * God grant that my suspicions may prove groundless." God didn't grant it. Even here in Idaho which is not a State of big industry and big corporations, there is a steady march toward monopoly and concentration of power. Hotels are an instance.

TAFT, BALL, and HARTLEY have said that "labor has become too big for its 'britches.'" That was true, but is true no longer. The outfit which today is much too big for its "britches" is the big corporations. Three automobile firms control 89 percent of all car and truck production; four iron and steel concerns control 85 percent; and four other firms control 100 percent of all roofing shingles. And these statistics I am taking from one of the few Republican newspapers which are alarmed, and would stop this march toward ruin before it has engulfed us.

Let us go back again to a year ago. We were told then that prices would not advance but would recede if OPA was sacked.

I remember very well the promises made on the floor of the Senate to the effect that if we would simply get rid of OPA everything would be all right, that the magic law of supply and demand would function perfectly.

Mr. Fisher continues:

On the contrary, privately financed housing has dropped more than 30 percent. Building materials as a whole are 25 percent higher, with lumber up to 50 percent, and paint up 80 percent or more.

Mr. President, I digress here to say that in Idaho we produce a great deal of lumber. I know that under OPA regulations the lumber producers were doing very well. I know of one mill operator, a Democrat—at least he professed to be—who was practically ready to join a revolution when Roosevelt came into power, and Roosevelt bailed him out and got him back on his feet, and he became rich, even under OPA during the war—that is, he became rich for Idaho. Some people might not call him rich, and individuals do not become really rich in that area; but he was rich in our eyes, anyway. If he did not become a Republican, he was right next door to it. He refused to vote for several Democrats because they were too radical to suit him. Yet only a short while before that he had wanted to have all debts canceled. He was running around and shouting to high heaven for the cancellation of debts just before Roosevelt saved his ungrateful neck. But now, Mr. President, the price of lumber has gone up 50 percent more since OPA was ended. So I presume this gentleman is doing very well now. I like to see our corporations and businessmen in Idaho do well, but I would rather they would do all right and that the rest of the country would do all right at the same time, rather than have profiteers in one segment of our economy and face the blow-up which we are facing.

Mr. Fisher goes on to say:

To realize how much food has climbed since then you have only to go into a grocery store.

I can verify that, Mr. President. I had been reading in the newspapers that prices had reached their peak, and perhaps were tapering off a little, when Mrs. Taylor and I went shopping for groceries last Saturday, but we left the store with a good deal less than we had gone in to purchase. We made up our minds not to be gouged. The prices were outrageous. They had gone up considerably since we had done our previous week's shopping.

Mr. Fisher continues:

To realize how much food has climbed since then you have only to go into a grocery store. And what about the profits of the industrial giants? We'll take their own word for it.

According to the Wall Street Journal, the earnings of 149 of the largest industrial firms have advanced—

Mr. President, may I say, not 50 percent, not 100 percent, not 150 percent, nor 200 percent nor 250 percent, but, according to Mr. Fisher, and he is a pretty reliable sort of chap—

Earnings of the largest industrial firms have advanced 282.7 percent over 1936; and of iron and steel companies, 370.4 percent.

Mr. President, I wonder if there is anyone who will contend that the earnings of labor have risen in any fair proportion to those figures. Yet, as I pointed out the other day, since I have become a Member of the Senate, practically all the legislation I have seen enacted here has been to help the big fellow and to suppress and push down the little people. They are going to get enough of that sort of thing one of these days and then many individuals who have been pushing this kind of legislation will not be coming back to the United States Senate and the House of Representatives. I can only say, Mr. President, that I hope such individuals will not lead us into such a catastrophe that I shall be obliged sometime to visit their graves where the populace has disposed of them as they have in the past when they have been beaten over the head too much.

Mr. Fisher continues:

Those are merely examples. Big industrialists have admitted within recent weeks that profits are "embarrassing."

"Embarrassing" is their word, not mine. I am merely quoting Mr. Fisher.

One index of the prosperity of big business is the money it spends for advertising. A hundred and nine companies in 1946 spent more than a million dollars each advertising their products, and such a firm as Procter & Gamble (soap) spent twenty-two and a half million.

The buying public paid for it.

It would be all right if advertising led to higher quality and lower prices, but that is exactly what it is not doing.

I may point out, Mr. President, that in the recent past we have seen the time when we could not buy soap in the stores, or soap flakes, soap powder, or other things one might want, and at the same time fabulous advertising campaigns on the radio and in the press continued unabated, and we were paying for it in high prices for soap that we could not even obtain. The manufacturers simply tacked the advertising costs onto the few boxes they sold, and sold them at absolutely exorbitant prices.

Mr. Fisher continues:

I could fill this entire space with statistics on the profits of the big corporations and with shame-faced statements of certain big-business leaders about those profits. Their weak excuse is that a time is coming when they will not be so prosperous and that as a consequence they must get the dough while the getting is good. And that's exactly the kind of statement that tickles Mr. Stalin.

I should like to support that statement. We hear a great deal of talk about some of us liberals who want to keep the economy on an even keel, who want labor to receive wages sufficient to buy the goods produced by industry. We are called Communists. The gentlemen with the outrageous profit figures which are being published are doing more to help Joe Stalin than are all the Communists and we liberals—whom some like to call Communists—put together.

Mr. Fisher continues:

All over this country, for months and months, the experts have been telling us that a recession is coming, and that after it, there will be a big bust in 5 or 7 or 10 years.

Personally, Mr. President, I do not think it will be that long. I hope it never comes; but the things that are going on are putting our economy so far out of balance that I do not see how it can possibly continue for 5, 7, or 10 years.

Mr. Fisher further states:

That big bust is what Joe is waiting for.

I had thought of buying a new car. I am aware that there may be some good cars coming off the lines now, but a friend of mine, who sells automobiles, advised me not to buy. He told me stories that are simply incredible—of how from the manifold of one car they took a piece of loose scrap iron so large that it had to be cut in two with a blowtorch; of how in another the motor went haywire in a few weeks; and of a third on which the owner, in an effort to keep it running, has spent almost as much as the car cost. As a matter of fact, I have a dentist friend who paid $1,800 plus for a car and has spent about $800 on it since then.

I should like to impress upon Members of the Senate again that in the last election campaign the man who wrote this article never lost an opportunity to take the hide off me as being a radical. He criticized me for wishing to continue OPA. I am not crowing over Mr. Fisher. I honor him for being frank enough to admit that he was taken in by the promises of the big boys that if we would only let them go they would be perfect gentlemen, and everything would be all right. Frankly, I was taken in when I first came here. I did not vote against the carry-back provision and the repeal of the excess-profits tax. As I remember, those were not record votes. However, I said, "If they say that, let us give them a chance and see what happens." I did not protest. At least, I did not ask to have my vote recorded in the negative. But from then on I have done so.

Mr. Fisher continues:

Is it the fault of labor? In part, no doubt; but it is also the fault of manufacturers who are milking the public of every dollar they can get while the udder is full. There was a time, not so long ago, when business in this country was guided by the principle of higher quality and lower prices. We have completely reversed that principle.

We have noticed, Mr. President, that every time President Truman issues an appeal for lower prices and voluntary price reductions—appeals to sportsmanship, manhood, or whatever one chooses to call it—the big fellows jump on him with both feet and tell him to keep his mouth shut and mind his own business, that they are doing fine, and that he is monkeying with the law of supply and demand.

Quoting further from Mr. Fisher:

Today we have higher prices and lower enterprise. Higher prices and lower quality are what they get under monopoly, either of Government or industry.

I agree with Mr. Fisher. I dislike extremes of either kind.

Reading further from Mr. Fisher's article:

We could take all the greed, the shoddy merchandise, the dishonest practices and survive them, indeed, even forgive them, if it were no more than that. We could get along for a while with furniture that collapses when we sit on it, with clothes that fall apart on the second laundering, and with steaks so tough at 60 cents a pound that a dog can't chew them.

I wish I were in Idaho, where I could get steak for 60 cents a pound. I envy my friend Mr. Fisher. We have not been able to find any for 60 cents a pound here; but I agree with him that it is so tough that a dog could not chew it.

Mr. Fisher further says:

We could say it was economic dislocation. We could admit, as we must, that prices must be higher because of higher costs, and because of a huge national debt and inflation; but there is more to it than that.

Some of us have known that our system is on trial and that this will probably be its last trial.

I agree with that statement.

It should be clear to any millionaire who can read that our system is on trial before the whole world, and that if we fail this time, we shall not get another chance and shall not deserve one.

When Mr. Fisher says that, I suppose he is speaking of all the people. But, Mr. President, it is not all the people who are responsible for bringing this catastrophe upon us. It is the selfish monopolists.

I invite the attention of my colleagues to a significant occurrence during the war. When our aviators flew over France they had these instructions: "If you are shot down or forced to bail out over France, do not go to the big houses, the mansions on the hill. Go to the homes of humble workers, because the chances are that you will find the fellow in the big house is sympathetic with the Germans, with nazism, with fascism, and will betray you."

That is not a flat statement. Of course there are exceptions. There are some people in the little houses who do not genuinely love democracy, and there are some who live in the big houses who love democracy and really believe in its principle. But generally speaking, it was so true that our Army gave those instructions to our aviators.

Mr. Fisher continues:

It is clear to a minority of our business leaders, and they have been telling their colleagues to come to their senses; but their colleagues apparently haven't much sense to come to.

Not long ago, for instance, there was a plan originated in a New England town. It was a plan on the part of retailers to reduce prices by 10 percent. Millions of words were written about the plan, but today it is as dead as last year's honeymoon. Retailers could not go on reducing prices unless prices were reduced to them—and the big fat boys, with their hands on monopolies, on the raw materials, refused to reduce. What they want is labor with a halter on it, and the old system of monopolies and unlimited concentration of economic power in the hands of a few.

I support that statement, Mr. President. We have had a fine example of putting a halter on labor here in the Senate Chamber within the last few days. God only grant that the President will veto the bill.

Mr. Fisher further says:

That is what they are getting now. They want another Harding and another decade like the 1920's and another bust. I had the naive idea that the combination of the 1929 crash and Franklin Roosevelt had taught the beef of the big trusts a lesson.

Senators can see how liberal this man is. Generally he criticizes the reforms of Franklin D. Roosevelt. But even he is now fed up with what is going on in the country, and what is going on in the Congress in the way of special-privilege legislation.

Quoting further from Mr. Fisher:

It appears that I and others like me were just about 100-percent wrong.

Meanwhile, the cynical old Machiavellian in the Kremlin sits back and waits. It was revealed the other day, by a correspondent in a position to know, that Stalin has asked his agents in this country to determine when our bust is coming, and how severe it will be. Under Roosevelt millions of words in lip service were paid to free enterprise, and it was said that when controls were lifted, business would accept its leadership and its responsibilities. It may not be too late yet, though one of the shrewdest Republicans I know in Idaho said to me the other day that he has decided it is now too late.

We must wait and see. Right now it looks as if the score is two down and one to go, with Stalin's men filling the bases, and with a monopolist at the bat.

I may say, Mr. President, that the next curve they are throwing at us—the pitcher is wound up and ready to throw it—is the Bulwinkle bill which is before the Senate at the present time.

OFFICES OF VETERANS' AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINES

After the conclusion of Mr. RUSSELL'S speech,

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, in view of the inclination of the Senator from Georgia to suggest the absence of a quorum, I think it is probably appropriate that I move a recess.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, the House has adopted an amendment to Senate Joint Resolution 115, authorizing the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to continue and establish offices in the territory of the Republic of the Philippines. I desire to move that the Senate concur in the House amendment. As passed by the Senate, the joint resolution contained no date limitation. The House has added an amendment which limits the right to continue or to establish such offices until June 30, 1948, for the reason that the subcommittee of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs is making a study of the whole subject and did not want to fence itself in with a bill that had no limitation. I doubt whether there would be any objection to the House amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BALDWIN in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. Res. 115) authorizing the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to continue and establish offices in the territory of the Republic of the Philippines, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the authority in section 7 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924 (43 Stat. 609; 38 U. S. C. 430), and section 101 of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944 (58 Stat. 284; 38 U. S. C. 693a) to establish regional offices, suboffices, contact units, or other subordinate offices may continue to be exercised by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs with respect to territory of the Republic of the Philippines on and after the date of its independence if he deems such offices necessary, but in no event after June 30, 1948.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado if this legislation had the approval of the executive department involved?

Mr. MILLIKIN. Yes, it did. The executive department would like the legislation without limitation. The Senate version was without limitation. The House Veterans' Committee is making a study of these facilities and, as I said, for that reason felt it wiser to put on a time limitation. I would rather have it without limitation, because I feel that it will be many years before we ever can get rid of our Veterans' Administration facilities in the Philippines. I see no harm, however, in accepting the House amendment, although I am confident we will have to renew the legislation against next year.

Mr. McMAHON. I thank the Senator very much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado to concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

RECESS

Mr. WHITE. I now move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, June 10, 1947, at 12 o'clock meridian.

MONDAY, JUNE 9, 1947

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we pray that Thy spirit may enjoin us to turn to Thy holy word, which gives the basic pattern for every good life: Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might; let not the rich man glory in his riches, but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth God.

Our Father, this day make Thyself felt in every issue before the Congress. Grant that Thy wisdom may be unto us revealed, with clear thinking, buoyant faith, and the truth in our minds that there is no permanent safety for man except in the Galilean Teacher. In the veiled future, known only to Thee, let this be our prayer: O cast us not away from Thy presence and take not Thy spirit from us. In all of life there is nothing so cheap as that which is best, and nothing so blessed as Thy guiding voice.

In the name of the Prophet of Nazareth. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, June 6, 1947, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 52. Concurrent resolution authorizing the Clerk of the House in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 3020) to make a certain change.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3020) entitled "An act to prescribe fair and equitable rules of conduct to be observed by labor and management in their relations with one another which affect commerce, to protect the rights of individual workers in their relations with labor organizations whose activities affect commerce, to recognize the paramount public interest in labor disputes affecting commerce that endanger the public health, safety, or welfare, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the President pro tempore has appointed Mr. LANGER and Mr. CHAVEZ members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of August 5, 1939, entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of certain records of the United States Government," for the disposition of executive papers in the following departments and agency:

1. Department of Agriculture.
2. Department of the Interior.
3. Department of Justice.
4. Department of the Navy.
5. Department of the Treasury.
6. Office of Temporary Controls.
7. Securities and Exchange Commission.

TAX VETO WOULD BE INDEFENSIBLE

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, the last Democratic Congress, upon the recommendation of President Truman, passed a tax bill in 1945 which reduced the tax on corporations by $6,000,000,000 in the face of a $20,000,000,000 deficit for the following year, and the President signed the measure with every indication of satisfaction. The Republicans on the Ways and Means Committee and in the House and Senate supported that measure with the understanding that a second tax bill giving relief to the individual taxpayers would be brought out the following year, but this was not done.

How different it is 2 years later when a Republican Congress carried out that pledge by passing a tax-reduction bill that would give $4,000,000,000 tax relief to nearly 50,000,000 individual taxpayers, and when we will have a surplus in excess of $7,000,000,000 after expenditures. Now, the President says that the Republican tax-reduction bill, which is favorable to the individual taxpayer, would be inflationary, hence he hesitates to sign it. Indeed, the indications are that he will veto the measure.

President Truman bases his objection on the fact that individual tax reduction would give the people more of their own money to spend, which he fears may result in further price increases. If there be merit in the President's contention, how does it come that he has repeatedly urged wage increases, which also give the wage earner more money to spend? Where lies the difference?

It is in order for the President to tell us how it comes that the Canadian people have already been given one tax reduction, with a second reduction which will amount to as much as 29 percent, to become effective July 1. The individual taxpayers of the United Kingdom have also been given a substantial tax reduction since the war's end, but if the President has his way American taxpayers will continue to stagger under their wartime tax load until Mr. Truman has been retired to private life.

I have long contended that one of the major causes for the existing labor unrest comes from the numerous deductions taken from pay envelopes, one of the major being the Federal withholding tax, which is also an income tax. The average wage earner bases his pay upon what he takes home. Under H. R. 1, which the President criticizes, such withholding tax would be reduced by as much as 30 percent, which would amount to $1 per week for a worker having a wife and one child, and earning $60 weekly. A yearly saving of $52 in the Federal income tax to a worker may appear inconsequential to Mr. Truman, but it is quite a substantial sum to the average working man, and this increased take-home pay will not force up prices, as does a wage increase.

Tax reduction now would greatly stimulate our economy, while a further continuance of the present tax burden will have the opposite effect.

TAX SITUATION

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 seconds.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the understanding of the gentleman from Minnesota was or what he imagined, but when the tax bill of 1945 was passed there was no understanding with Mr. Truman as to a tax bill in 1946 or 1947.

GOVERNMENT CORPORATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL, 1948

Mr. JENSEN, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 3756) making appropriations for Government corporations and independent executive agencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1948, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 544), which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORE reserved all points of order on the bill.

STATE DEPARTMENT MEETINGS

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, a story in the Wall Street Journal this morning reports that the State Department has been holding meetings in Washington for a large group of individuals believed useful for propaganda purposes, and that at these meetings the press has been deliberately barred.

I would venture to suggest that Congress, before it passes any more appropriations for the State Department, or before it authorizes the so-called Voice of America, find out about this home-front secret Voice of America activity at the State Department. It may be that this iron curtain is small, unimportant, and justified but it is a bad sign.

The American people should have a free press and full information about the domestic-propaganda activities of their own Government. Particularly is it important that the State Department, which is rightly agitated about the lack of free information abroad, not resort here to the same iron-curtain tactics that they condemn abroad.

Congress should get the facts and stop this kind of business in its tracks. This incident is certainly a questionable procedure for a State Department that preaches freedom of press and freedom of information.

NATIONAL HEART DISEASE ACT

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minutes and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced in the House today a bill endorsed by the American Heart Association, the leading private agency in the field, which provides for a program of research in diseases of the heart and circulation and to aid in the development of more effective methods of prevention, diagnosis, and treatment of such diseases to be administered through a National Heart Disease Institute in the United States Public Health Service.

This bill should truly appeal to the Nation. In return for the expenditure of a fraction of what was spent on a month of destruction by the United States in World War II, new hope and opportunity to live out their lives can be given to millions of people in our own country who otherwise will have to face the tragic prospect of being stricken down in youth or the prime of life by heart disease.

Heart disease strikes not only at the old, causing nearly one out of every two deaths after the age of 45, but it saps the strength of the youth of the Nation as well. It causes more deaths among children and the young between the ages of 5 and 19 than any other disease.

A pathetically small amount of money is now being spent on research to cut the death toll of those who suffer from the Nation's No. 1 killer—heart disease. Although Congress has allocated $29,866,200 for research and control of plant and animal diseases, to the Department of Agriculture alone, no specific amount has been set aside in the Budget of the United States for research in cardiovascular diseases. During World War II—the most destructive in history—battle deaths in our country's armed forces approximated 325,000, but during the same period more than 2,000,000 men, women, and children on the home front were killed by diseases of the heart. Heart disease takes a greater death toll than the five other leading causes of death combined.

Voluntary agencies such as the American Heart Association have been doing yeoman work in leading the fight against heart disease, but thus far their research program in the care, prevention, and treatment of this disease has been seriously handicapped by lack of funds.

The United States Public Health Service which is responsible for raising the standards of health throughout the country and for administering the various health programs which have been established, should be given adequate funds to help meet the challenge of this disease, which has been allowed to take its toll in human lives too long without a spirited attempt to do something about the situation.

STATE DEPARTMENT MEETINGS

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, it was my pleasure to take part in this "secret meeting" of the State Department last week. I should like to inform the Congress that to my mind that meeting of some 250 delegates from some 250 organizations of this country, which was pursuant to legislation passed by this House to give information on foreign policy to the people of the country, was one of the most progressive, sane, and constructive conferences I have ever attended. Mr. PETE JARMAN, Senator CONNALLY, Senator FLANDERS, and I spoke on the evening when these delegates were given the opportunity to speak to and with the Congress.

In order to have the very freest discussion possible—so that the hair could be taken down—these meetings were "off the record."

On the evening when we four Members of Congress participated I can assure you the hair was taken down very constructively.

I agree that it would have been advisable had the State Department opened the meetings to Members of the Congress, but I want to say to this body, Mr. Speaker, that I feel this effort on the part of the Department to give information to one of the great sections of our citizenship—members of 250 national organizations—to have been a most commendable one. It is my earnest hope and my expectation that the material given these delegates will be made available promptly to the Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in three instances, and in one to include editorials and articles. I am informed that one of these extensions may exceed the two-page limit, but I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed notwithstanding that fact.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that today, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore granted, I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

A GROSS OF GREEN SPECTACLES

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Speaker, you will recall, no doubt, the incident related in Goldsmith's The Vicar of Wakefield, when the vicar decided to sell the family colt so as to buy a horse in order to maintain the family position in local society. Little Moses, a son, was sent off by the father to the fair and entrusted with the responsibility of making the trade. In the course of carrying out his responsibility, he fell in with some horse traders. These traders found many faults with the colt and convinced the lad by their many arguments that he should dispose of the colt for a gross of green spectacles.

Recently, Mr. Cecil S. Lynch, executive vice president of the Arkansas Power & Light Co., sent me a pamphlet entitled "Taking the Mystery Out of the Power Problem." Having known Mr. Lynch for many years, I was much interested in this little booklet. I read it carefully. Then I read it again to be sure that my first reaction was correct. The arguments in this little pamphlet, because of the striking similarity, reminded me of the story of little Moses with the colt and the gross of green spectacles.

Mr. Lynch has critically examined in the pamphlet the hydroelectric projects owned by the Government in the Southwest. He has found them of little value unless all of the power produced by them is sold to the local utility companies. He argues that, since the power of these projects has little value, all of it should be sold to the local utility companies for a gross of green spectacles.

Last year the Government sold Mr. Lynch's company the entire output of the Norfork project, which, by the way, is located in the district which I represent, at an average rate of 3 mills per kilowatt-hour. This power was then sold by his company, on the average, for four times the amount which they paid for it. In other words, his company received approximately $2,400,000 for this power from its consumers, for which it paid the Government $664,000 at the dam. This is the green spectacles deal which the local utility companies advocate.

Let us examine the thesis upon which they rely. It is my contention that it is unsound on at least three counts: First, it ignores the value derived from interconnecting and integrating electric plants; second, it holds that the hydroelectric plants must work without assistance; and, third, it finds that the electric companies cannot cooperate with the Government except on the companies' own terms.

Now, let us consider these three different views of this matter:

First. Advantages of interconnecting hydroelectric projects: In this pamphlet is cited as a striking example of the value of interconnecting and coordinating private electric facilities, the organization of the Southwest power pool in which 11 utility companies in the Southwest were interconnected. The pamphlet says, "Through this arrangement; the electric companies gained in excess of 120,000 kilowatts of generating capacity by building a few transmission lines and working together in harmony without installing a single new generator."

The argument could have been carried a step further, and have pointed out that each of the 11 companies had created additional kilowatts of power by interconnecting within their own systems. I believe Mr. Lynch knows that when two hydroelectric projects are interconnected the sum total of firm power at the two projects is greater after interconnecting than before. I think he also knows that when 15 or 20 such projects located in 4 or 5 different regions separated by hundreds of miles the sum total of firm power will be far greater when these projects are interconnected than when they are separate and isolated projects. Yet when he stops to evaluate a hydroelectric project, he does so on an individual and isolated basis.

Recently a study was made over a period of 1927 to 1945, inclusive, of integrating the proposed Bull Shoals Dam, the Norfork and Denison Dams, both completed. The most critical water shortage over this 19-year period developed between 1938 and 1942, with the most critical shortage occurring in 1940. The following is taken from that report:

It will be observed that the year 1940 found all these reservoirs well below the top of the power pool; however, the low inflow period, including 1940, neither began nor ended at the same time at any two of these projects. For instance, the critical period at Denison Dam began in July 1938 and ended in May 1941; at Norfork it began in July 1939 and ended in December 1942; at Bull Shoals it began in August 1939 and ended in April 1941. Thus it became apparent that during the first year, July 1938, to July 1939, the Bull Shoals and Norfork projects could have carried a considerable amount of the load at Denison, thereby saving water and preserving a high head at Denison and allowing it a larger margin of safety through the remainder of the period. In addition, since the Bull Shoals Reservoir filled before that at Denison, it could again carry part of the Denison load and allow it to fill at an earlier date. After April 1941 Denison and Bull Shoals together were capable of absorbing almost the full load on Norfork, which would result in the Norfork Reservoir filling in less than a year before it would have otherwise filled.

The result of this study shows that by integrating these three dams, the firm capacity would be increased from 62,900 kilowatts to 72,900 kilowatts, an increase of 10,000 kilowatts. This is an increase of approximately 16 percent. It is believed that when all of the projects are interconnected, the increase in the firm capacity will be approximately 20 or 25 percent.

The above advantages are derived from diversity in climate, difference in terrain, mass air movements, and difference in speed of current. In addition, there are advantages resulting from market diversity. Then, too, there are differences in economic activities in the various parts of the region, such as agriculture, mining, oil- and gas-field operations, forestry, and manufacturing, which would tend to create a diversity between the market centers of the area, and would enable larger loads to be carried with the same generating capacity.

Why the advantages of interconnecting and coordinating hydroelectric facilities is overlooked in the pamphlet is not easily understood, especially since Mr. Lynch was basing his case upon similar advantages arising out of interconnecting and coordinating steam plants by the private companies. Could it be that green spectacles are involved?

Second. Advantages of coordinating steam and hydroelectric plants, Mr. Lynch says:

The problem is to find a job that these hydroelectric plants can do without assistance. And that job must be of sufficient value to equal the annual cost of the project.

In other words, he argues that the buyer believes that he must tell the Government, the seller, just how it must sell its power from these hydroelectric plants. The best way, Mr. Lynch says, is for the Government to turn this power over to the companies at the dams, so that they can use the capacity to handle their peak loads, then dump the remainder of the energy into their system for future use.

Now let us take a look at Mr. Lynch's figures. By isolating the Norfork project, he states that his company and sister companies in Louisiana and Mississippi during 1945 absorbed the firm capability of its 70,000-kilowatt capacity, assuming that the second unit at Norfolk had been installed, by using 66,000 kilowatts for a total of 1,640 hours during the year. Now, let me assume that the Bull Shoals project, 30 miles away with 126,000 kilowatts of installed capacity, or 60,800 kilowatts firm capacity, was in operation and that Mr. Lynch had to absorb that also into this system. The only way this could be done would be to use Norfork or Bull Shoals for many more than 1,640 hours at full capacity during the year. If he had used Norfork 3,000 hours, the return to the Government would have been $590,120. If we refer to his chart and put Bull Shoals and Norfork on the peak day load of 196,000 kilowatts, Government hydro would be carrying the full load of from 264,000 kilowatts to 460,000 kilowatts. This would mean that he would be carrying part of his base load throughout the 24 hours with Government hydroelectric power. The only way he could use hydro from any other Government dams during the same day would be as base-load plants.

If Table Rock and Blakely Mountain were in operation, he would have to base load these hydro plants, and, therefore, under his plan, the annual return from Norfork would be only $317,570 to the Government, less than one-half of the annual cost of operating Norfork. It is easy to see, therefore, that the position of the Government would be untenable under Mr. Lynch's plan long before Greers Valley, Wolf Bayou, Narrows, Bull Shoals, Table Rock, Dardanelle, Ozark, Beaver, and other hydroelectric projects come into operation.

Of course, what Mr. Lynch would try to do when more peaking power was available in the Government's hydroelectric plants in Arkansas than he could profitably use in his system, would be to export it far and wide and dump it into affiliated and favored private-company systems. In this way, it would be impossible to give the benefits of this peaking power to the people who have the money invested in the dams and who need it most in nearby communities.

The question arises then: What plan would work to the mutual advantage of both the people and the private companies?

The people will have considerable peaking capacity in their hydroelectric plants which the private-utility companies will need badly. Private-utility companies will have off-peak energy from their steam plants which the Government, as a representative of the people, will need to firm up its secondary energy. This represents a perfect situation for mutual benefits if the parties will cooperate.

Mr. Lynch says:

The Southwest Power Administration appears to be utterly unwilling to do any sharing of gains, but wants them all.

The Government is willing to share the gains, but not for a gross of green spectacles. A fine example of this willingness to work with the private companies is the recent contract signed by the Government with the Texas Power & Light Co.—a contract which all the utility companies in the Southwest should be only too willing to accept as good business.

The way to share the gains is for the Government to sell peaking capacity to the utility companies in return for off-peak steam energy. No money need be exchanged except to settle balances. The energy given by the Government to the company during the peak hours would be returned to the Government during the companies' off-peak hours. It is fairly estimated that an on-peak kilowatt-hour is worth three off-peak kilowatt hours, therefore the companies would return three kilowatt-hours for each kilowatt-hour which the Government gave it for peaking purposes.

The value of an on-peak kilowatt-hour was determined by Mr. Lynch on the basis of $11.50 per kilowatt and 1.19 mills per kilowatt-hour. Computed on this basis, the on-peak energy would be worth 12.69 mills per kilowatt-hour. To show how that figure per kilowatt-hour is arrived at, 35,000 kilowatts at $11.50 per kilowatt equals $402,500; 35,000,000 kilowatt-hours at 1.19 mills per kilowatt-hour amounts to $41,650; $402,500 plus $41,650 equals $444,150; $444,150 divided by 35,000,000 kilowatt hours equals 12.69 mills per kilowatt-hour. By returning to the Government three off-peak kilowatt-hours for each kilowatt-hour given on peak, the company would be receiving the equivalent of 4.23 mills per kilowatt-hour for its off-peak energy. The company purchased 574,000,000 kilowatt-hours in 1945 from sources other than Southwest Power Administration. These purchases represented all kinds of power, much of it dependable and firm. The company paid 4.7 mills for this energy. By comparison, 4.23 mills for its off-peak power would be exceptionally favorable.

Now, let us apply this plan to the Norfork project over the period 1927–45, based on the actual water conditions and assuming 70,000 kilowatts of installed capacity. For argument's sake the project is interconnected with Denison and Bull Shoals. Let us assume that the Government contracts give Mr. Lynch's company the full use of one generator; that is, 35,000 kilowatt-hours for any 4 hours of each 250 working days a year. This would guarantee him 35,000 kilowatts for peaking purposes during 4 hours every day. To do this would require 2,917,000 kilowatt-hours per month. On a monthly basis the company could use Norfork for peaking more than 4 hours per day on some days of each month. This company would receive annually 35,000,000 on-peak kilowatt-hours and give back to the Government 105,000,000 off-peak kilowatt hours. The table which I ask permission to insert in the RECORD at this point shows how this plan would have worked over the 19-year period. I trust that the Members of the House will study this carefully.

Average annual revenue for the 19-year period									1,099,722

[1] Table based upon (a) 70,000 kilowatts installed capacity utilizing actual water available during the period; (b) contract to supply A. P. & L. Co. with 35,000 kilowatts during any 4 hours daily for 250 workdays a year for peaking purposes and the comyany to return the project 3 kilowatt-hours of off-peak energy for each kilowatt-hour received; (c) borrowing small amounts of kilowatt-hours from other S. P. A. projects; (d) S. P. A. serving a load of its own of 40,000 kilowatts using 400 hours per month; and (e) selling surplus kilowatt-hours in wet years at 1.19 mills per kilowatt-hour.

[2] Represents the annual energy to be returned to S. P. A. during off-peak periods in exchange for 35,000,000 killowatt-hours of energy annually delivered to A. P. & L. Co. for peaking purposes. Exchange made on the basis of 3 kilowatt-hours for 1 kilowatt-hour.

[3] Small amounts of energy borrowed from other S. P. A. projects during some low-water years.

[4] Total annual energy required to serve S. P. A. load of 192,000,000 kilowatt-hours, and 35,000,000 kilowatt-hours supplied to A. P. & L. Co. for peaking.

The Government would have received under this plan $20,894,712 during the 19-year period. Under Mr. Lynch's plan, the companies would have received amounts varying from $6,033,830 to $17,767,280. The average return to the Government probably would be between these two figures. Mr. Lynch's company's present contract with the Government at an average rate of 3 mills per kilowatt-hour would have returned to the Government only $10,197,816 during the 19-year period.

According to the Army engineer studies, the project should return $712,000 annually to the Government in order to defray all costs of operation and amortize the investment of the people in the projects. On this basis, the project should have returned $13,528,000 during the 19-year period. Under the plan proposed, it would have returned $20,895,000, or $7,367,000 more than necessary to pay all costs at the dam—a saving of $7,367,000 during the period for the people which they could use either as a saving to the consumers in rate reduction or to reduce the time in which the people completely pay for the project.

Third. Mutually advantageous cooperation: The Southwest Power Administration has suggested to the companies the desirability of letting the Government use the supply capacity which the companies have in their lines. This plan would avoid the necessity of the Government constructing lines where unused capacity in existing lines owned by the companies would serve the Government's need.

This plan is consistent with Mr. Lynch's argument. He uses towns A and B. By cooperating, the towns solved one another's problems to the advantage of each. Mr. Lynch realizes the human element. He points out that if there is pride, jealousy, or suspicion, an agreement between the towns cannot be reached. He says:

> It would be much easier to compose the engineering features of this problem than to compose the human elements behind them.

Mr. Lynch has not been able to solve his own human element with respect to the Southwest Power Administration, as he is suspicious and fearful of it. Among other things, he says:

> Acceptance of the proposal that SPA be allowed to use transmission lines of the electric companies for distribution of SPA power would certainly make SPA power available to every customer of the electric companies, and SPA can take any of these customers from the companies by getting those customers to insist on buying SPA power. * * * The SPA rates, it must be remembered, would be subsidized through freedom of this Government Bureau from taxes and from the fact that this Bureau would be using tax funds at lower rates of interest than a business could obtain its money. * * * SPA insists on having an electric system all its own either by construction or by full use of electric-company lines, and it is pushing these insistences under the guise that it is the only possible way that can be worked out for the distribution of power and energy from the Government dams. * * * No; the plan proposed by SPA cannot be worked without great damage and ultimate destruction of the existing electric companies.

In the light of these statements by Mr. Lynch, it is understandable, just as he points out, that town A and town B could not come to a real agreement until they resolved their human differences. Likewise, Mr. Lynch and the Government cannot reach a mutually advantageous agreement relative to the power generated by the dams which the people are building in Arkansas and the Southwest, until Mr. Lynch has resolved his personal attitude toward the Southwest Power Administration, and is willing to follow the fine example of public service set by the Texas Power & Light Co.

Therefore, the people must reject Mr. Lynch's offer of a gross of green spectacles.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SABATH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include two editorials and one article.

Mr. KEATING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances, in one to include an address by Mr. George Maurice Morris, former president of the American Bar Association, and two Korean jurists, and in the other an editorial from the Rochester Democratic Chronicle.

Mr. VURSELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial of June 5 from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch entitled "Lowering the Presidency," and another editorial of the same date entitled "The Attorney General Dodges the Issue."

VOICE OF AMERICA

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to serve notice on the Membership of the House that when the so-called Mundt bill providing for a so-called Voice of America comes up for action, I expect to offer a motion to recommit that bill to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FARRINGTON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial on statehood for Hawaii.

DISSEMINATING IMFORMATION ABOUT AMERICA

Mr. MILLER of Nebrasa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, in the Christian Science Monitor of Saturday, I read the following:

> There are 17,000 unofficial ambassadors from other lands in the United States. They are watching Americans first-hand and observing everything that Americans do, say, and think. They are living in nearly every State in most of the big cities and towns and rural communities. They do not live in the embassies or the consulates. They live where the ordinary Americans do and the plain citizens in practically every walk of life. They are foreign students in American colleges and American universities.

Personally, I am glad that they are here; they are learning about America and I hope are 17,000 good missionaries that should be considered when the Congress takes up the bill for the Voice of America. The Congress ought to also consider very carefully how many more might be brought in under the so-called bill the Voice of America. We must keep in mind that our universities are now turning away worthy GI's who would like to enter school this year and next year. There is no room for them. There is no surplus housing for aliens. The Voice of America should be recommitted and cut down to just a factual interesting newscast about America.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and the conclusion of special orders heretofore entered I may address the House for 15 minutes today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

LESS SPENDING, LESS DEBT

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested when the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] spoke about the tax bill and how the people wanted tax relief, then the distinguished minority leader rose and said that he did not know of any agreement whereby the President agreed to reduce taxes.

That might be, and I presume it is the truth.

Taxes, taxes, taxes, taxes—not more taxes, we want less taxes; as Republicans we want less taxes for the American people. The Republicans promised less taxes and we passed the bill giving them less taxes. It is now up to the President. If the people do not get less taxes it is now the fault of President Truman.

The Republicans passed the tax bill, cutting down the burden of taxation. You know what happened in the last 10 or 15 years under the New Deal. I came here to Congress when we had a national debt of $21,000,000,000. Then the New Deal increased that national debt until on June 4 it was over $257,000,000,000. I was in this House when the Democrats brought in one tax bill after another, requesting taxes from the people, until they brought in 15 different tax bills in less than 15 years. That is some terrible record of taxation. What the Republicans are trying to do is to cut down on these great expenses that the Democrats built up in the last 15 years. More bureaus and functions of government. We have the greatest debt of any nation in the world inherited from a Democratic Congress. We want to apply everything we can on this terrible debt. I would suggest that President Truman use every effort, after he relieves the taxpayers of a little of the burden he placed on them during the Democratic administration in the last 14 years, to cut down Government expenses. If the President will try to cut down the Government expenses we can easily reduce taxes.

The President is asking for spending here and there and everywhere, not only over our own country for every purpose, but he now has a program for spending all over the world. I say to you, Mr. President, cut down on their spending. Less spending means less taxes. I recommend it also to the Democratic Party. We Republicans are cutting down expenses in the House and Senate, but we get no help from the Democrats, no help from the President. Why? They seem too anxious to spend and not to save.

Cut down taxes, cut down spending; less spending, means less debt. Our spending will be the measure of cutting down our debt. We should cut down spending six billions a year and apply it on debt payment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] has expired.

PRIVATE RIGHT-OF-WAY TO ROSCOE L. WOOD

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 1288) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant a private right-of-way to Roscoe L. Wood, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

> Line 8, strike out " for so long as needed" and insert "until this land has access to a contiguous highway or public way."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH]?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

VOICE OF AMERICA

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the Members of the House to section 301 of the Voice of America bill.

This section 301 is an immigration bill as it pertains to the entry and deportation of people. As I read the section, it gives authority to the Secretary of State to permit the entry of an endless number of persons. They can come to this country outside quotas and the immigration laws of the country. When deportation is found necessary they are put under the Immigration Act of 1917, and the Department of Justice has a poor record of deporting people. It will be possible for thousands to come to this country and declare themselves to be displaced persons by saying "I cannot be sent home. I will be shot," or "The political picture has changed and I have no home." So they become refugees and stay as long as they want to. In my opinion this section absolutely opens up the immigration gates of this country. I ask you to please give this section 301 serious study before we vote on H. R. 3342 or the so-called Voice of America bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the House that this is District of Columbia day and that the Committee on the District of Columbia has two bills, the first of which is not controversial, and I propose to call it up in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The second bill deals with a revamping of the tax structure of the District of Columbia, and on that I shall move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, with the possibility of trying to get an agreement for 2 hours of general debate. Then the bill will be read under the 5-minute rule.

AMENDING ACT TO REGULATE THE BUSINESS OF LIFE INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 1634) to amend section 1, and provisions (6), (7), and (8) of section 3, and provision (3) of section 4 of chapter V of the act of June 19, 1934, entitled "An act to regulate the business of life insurance in the District of Columbia," and to add sections 5a, 5b, and 5c, thereto, and I ask unanimous consent that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of chapter V of the Act of June 19, 1934, entitled "An Act to regulate the business of life insurance in the District of Columbia," be amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. Superintendent to value policies; legal standard of valuation: (a) The Superintendent shall annually value, or cause to be valued, the reserve liabilities (hereinafter called reserves) for all outstanding life-insurance policies and annuity and pure endownment contracts of every life-insurance company doing business in the District except that in the case of an alien company such valuation shall be limited to its insurance transactions in the United States, and may certify the amount of any such reserves, specifying the mortality table or tables, rate or rates of interest and methods (net level premium method or other) used in the calculation of such reserves. All such valuations made by him or by his authority, shall be made upon the net premium basis. In calculating such reserves, he may use group methods and approximate averages for fractions of a year or otherwise. In lieu of the valuation of the reserves herein required of any foreign or alien company, he may accept any valuation made, or caused to be made, by the insurance supervisory official of any State or other jurisdiction when such valuation complies with the minimum standard herein provided and if the official of such State or jurisdiction accepts as sufficient and valid for all purposes the certificate of valuation of the Superintendent when such certificate states the valuation to have been made in a specified manner according to which the aggregate reserves would be at least as large as if they had been computed in the manner prescribed by the law of that State or jurisdiction.

"Any such company which at any time shall have adopted any standard of valuation producing greater aggregate reserves than those calculated according to the minimum standard herein provided may, with the approval of the Superintendent, adopt any lower standard of valuation, but not lower than the minimum herein provided.

"(b) This subsection shall apply to only those policies and contracts issued prior to the operative date of section 5b (the standard nonforfeiture law) of this chapter.

"The legal minimum standard for the valuation of life-insurance contracts issued before January 1, 1935, shall be the method and basis of valuation heretofore applied by the Superintendent in the valuation of such contracts, and for life-insurance contracts issued on and after said date shall be the 1-year preliminary term method of valuation, except as hereinafter modified, on the basis of the American Experience Table of Mortality with interest at 3½ per centum per annum: Provided, That any life company may, at its option, value its insurance contracts issued on and after January 1, 1935, in accordance with their terms on the basis of the American Men Ultimate Table of Mortality with interest not higher than 3½ per centum per annum by the level net premium method or by the modified preliminary term method hereinafter described.

"If the premium charged for term insurance under a limited payment life preliminary term policy providing for the payment of all premiums thereon is less than 20 years from date of the policy, or under an endowment preliminary term policy, exceeds that charged for like insurance under 20 payment life preliminary term policies of the same company, the reserve thereon at the end of the year, including the first, shall not be less than the reserve on a 20 payment life preliminary term policy issued in the same year and at the same age, together with an amount which shall be equivalent to the accumulation of a net level premium sufficient to provide for a pure endowment at the end of the premium payment period, equal to the difference between the value at the end of such period of such a 20 payment life preliminary term policy and the full net level premium reserve at such time of such a limited payment life or endowment policy. The premium payment period is the period during which premiums are concurrently payable under such 20 payment life preliminary term policy and such limited payment life or endowment policy.

"Policies issued on the preliminary term method shall contain a clause specifying that the reserve thereof shall be computed in accordance with the modified preliminary term method of valuation provided for herein.

"The legal minimum standard for the valuation of annuities issued on and after January 1, 1935, shall be McClintock's Table of Mortality Among Annuitants, with interest at 4 percent per annum, but annuities deferred 10 or more years and written in connection with life insurance shall be valued on the same basis as that used in computing the consideration or premium therefor, or upon any higher standard at the option of the company.

"The legal minimum standard for the valuation of industrial policies issued after January 1, 1935, shall be the American Experience Table of Mortality with interest at 3½ percent per annum: Provided, That any life company may voluntarily value its industrial policies on the basis of the standard industrial mortality table or the substantial industrial mortality table by the level net premium method or in accordance with their terms by the modified preliminary term method hereinbefore described.

"The Superintendent may vary the standards of interest and mortality in the case of alien companies as to contracts issued by such companies in other countries than the United States, and in particular cases of invalid lives and other extra hazards.

"Reserves for all such policies and contracts may be calculated, at the option of the company,, according to any standards which produce greater aggregate reserves for all such policies and contracts than the minimum reserves required by this subsection.

"(c) This subsection shall apply to only those policies and contracts issued on or after the operative date of section 5B (the standard nonforfeiture law) of this chapter.

"(1) The minimum standard for the valuation of all such policies and contracts shall be the Commissioners reserve valuation method defined in paragraph (2), 3½ percent interest, and the following tables:

"(i) For all ordinary policies of life insurance issued on the standard basis, excluding any disability and accidental-death benefits in such policies, the Commissioners 1941 Standard Ordinary Mortality Table.

"(ii) For all industrial life-insurance policies issued on the standard basis, excluding any disability and accidental-death benefits in such policies, the 1941 Standard Industrial Mortality Table.

"(iii) For annuity and pure endowment contracts, excluding any disability and accidental-death benefits in such policies, the 1937 Standard Annuity Mortality Table.

"(iv) For total and permanent disability benefits in or supplementary to ordinary policies or contracts, class (3) Disability Table (1926) which, for active lives, shall be combined with a mortality table permitted for calculating the reserves for life-insurance policies.

"(v) For accidental-death benefits in or supplementary to policies, the Intercompany Double Indemnity Mortality Table combined with a mortality table permitted for calculating the reserves for life-insurance policies.

"(vi) For group life insurance, life insurance issued on the substandard basis and other special benefits, such tables as may be approved by the Superintendent.

"(2) Reserves according to the Commissioners reserve valuation method, for the life insurance and endowment benefits of policies providing for a uniform amount of insurance and requiring the payment of uniform premiums shall be the excess, if any, of the present value, at the date of valuation, of such future guaranteed benefits provided for by such policies, over the then present value of any future modified net premiums therefor. The modified net premiums for any such policy shall be such uniform percentage of the respective contract premiums for such benefits that the present value, at the date of issue of the policy, of all such modified net premiums shall be equal to the sum of the then present value of such benefits provided for by the policy and the excess of (A) over (B), as follows:

"(A) A net level annual premium equal to the present value, at the date of issue, of such benefits provided for after the first policy year, divided by the present value, at the date of issue, of an annuity of one per annum payable on the first and each subsequent anniversary of such policy on which a premium falls due: Provided, however, That such net level annual premium shall not exceed the net level annual premium on the 19-year premium whole life plan for insurance of the same amount at an age 1 year higher than the age at issue of such policy.

"(B) A net 1-year term premium for such benefits provided for in the first policy year.

"Reserves according to the Commissioners reserve valuation method for (i) life-insurance policies providing for a varying amount of insurance or requiring the payment of varying premiums, (ii) annuity and pure endowment contracts, (iii) disability and accidental death benefits in all policies and contracts, and (iv) all other benefits, except life insurance and endowment benefits in life-insurance policies, shall be calculated by a method consistent with the principles of this paragraph (2).

"(3) In no event shall a company's aggregate reserves for all life-insurance policies, excluding disability and accidental death benefits, be less than the aggregate reserves calculated in accordance with the method set forth in paragraph (2) and the mortality table or tables and rate or rates of interest used in calculating nonforfeiture benefits for such policies.

"(4) Reserves for any category of policies, contracts, or benefits as established by the Superintendent, may be calculated, at the option of the company, according to any standards which produce greater aggregate reserves for such category than those calculated according to the minimum standard herein provided, but the rate or rates of interest used shall not be higher than the corresponding rate or rates of interest used in calculating any nonforfeiture benefits provided for therein: Provided, however, That reserves for participating life-insurance policies may, with the consent of the Superintendent, be calculated according to a rate of interest lower than the rate of interest used in calculating the nonforfeiture benefits in such policies, with the further proviso that if such lower rate differs from the rate used in the calculation of the nonforfeiture benefits by more than one-half percent the company issuing such policies shall file with the Superintendent a plan providing for such equitable increases, if any, in the cash surrender values and nonforfeiture benefits in such policies as the Superintendent shall approve."

SEC. 2. That provisions (6), (7), and (8) of section 3 of Chapter V of said Act, be amended to read as follows:

"(6) A provision that after the policy has been in force three full years the company at any time, while the policy is in force, will advance, on proper assignment or pledge of the policy and on the sole security thereof, at a specified rate of interest, a sum equal to, or at the option of the insured less than the amount required by section 5c of this chapter under the conditions specified thereby; and that the company will deduct from such loan value any indebtedness not already deducted in determining such value and any unpaid balance of the premium for the current policy year, and may collect interest in advance on the loan to the end of the current policy year. This provision shall not be required in term insurance, nor shall it apply to temporary insurance or pure endowment insurance, issued or granted in exchange for lapsed or surrendered policies. The policy may further provide that if the interest on the loan is not paid when due it shall be added to the existing loan and shall bear interest at the same rate.

"(7) A provision for nonforfeiture benefits and cash-surrender values in accordance with the requirements of section 5a or section 5b of this chapter.

"(8) A provision specifying the options, if any, to which the policyholder is entitled in the event of default in a premium payment."

SEC. 3. That provision (3) of section 4 of chapter V of said act, be amended to read as follows:

"(3) Except for provisions relating to misstatement of age, suicide, aviation, and military or naval service in time of war, a provision for any mode of settlement at maturity, after the expiration of the contestable period of the policy, of less value than the amount insured on the face of the policy plus dividend additions, if any, less any indebtedness to the company on or secured by the policy, and less any premium that may, by the terms of the policy, be deducted. This paragraph shall not apply to any nonforfeiture provision."

SEC. 4. That said act is amended by inserting after section 5 of chapter V thereof the following three new sections:

"SEC. 5a. Nonforfeiture benefits and cash-surrender values: This section shall apply only to policies of life insurance issued prior to the operative date of section 5b (the standard nonforfeiture law) of this chapter.

"The nonforfeiture benefits referred to in provision (7) of section 3 of this chapter shall be available to the insured in event of default in premium payments, after premiums shall have been paid for 3 years, and shall be a stipulated form of insurance, effective from the due date of the defaulted premium, the net value of which shall be at least equal to the reserve at the date of default on the policy and on dividend additions thereto, if any, exclusive of the reserve on account of return premium insurance and on total and permanent disability and additional accidental death benefits (the policy to specify the mortality table and rate of interest adopted for computing such reserve), less a specified percentage (not more than 2½) of the amount insured by the policy and of existing dividend additions thereto, if any, and less any existing indebtedness to the company on or secured by the policy: Provided, That a company may, in lieu of the provision herein permitted for the deduction from the reserve of a sum not more than 2½ percent of the amount insured by the policy, and of any dividend additions thereto, insert in the policy a provision that one-fifth of said reserve may be deducted, or may provide therein that a deduction may be made of said 2½ percent or one-fifth of said reserve, at the option of the company: Provided further, That the policy may be surrendered to the company at its home office within 1 month of the due date of defaulted premium for a specified cash value at least equal to the sum which would otherwise be available for the purchase of insurance as aforesaid: And provided further, That the company may defer payment for not more than 6 months after the application therefor is made. A provision may also be inserted in the policy that in event of default in a premium payment before such benefit becomes available, the reserve on any dividend additions then in force may at the option of the company be paid in cash or applied as a net premium to the purchase of paid-up term insurance for any amount not in excess of the face of the original policy. This section shall not apply to term insurance of 20 years or less. The net single-premium rate employed in computing the term of temporary insurance or the amount of pure endowment insurance granted as a nonforfeiture value under any life-insurance policy may at the option of the company be based upon a table of mortality showing rates of mortality not greater than 130 percent of those shown by the American Men Ultimate Table of Mortality instead of the table used in computing the reserve on the policy, or in case of substandard policies not greater than 130 percent of the rates of mortality shown by the table of mortality approved by the Superintendent for computing the reserve on the policy, anything herein to the contrary notwithstanding.

"SEC. 5. Standard nonfeiture laws: (a) In the case of policies issued on or after the operative date of this section, as defined in subsection (g) no policy of life insurance, except as stated in subsection (f), shall be issued or delivered in the District of Columbia unless it shall contain in substance the following provisions, or corresponding provisions which in the opinion of the Superintendent are at least as favorable to the defaulting or surrendering policyholder—

"(1) that, in event of default in any premium payment after premiums have been paid one full year in the case of ordinary insurance or three full years in the case of industrial insurance, the company will grant, upon proper request not later than 60 days after the due date of the premium in default, a paid-up nonforfeiture benefit on a plan stipulated in the policy, effective as of such due date, of such value as may be hereinafter specified;

"(2) that, upon surrender of the policy within 60 days after the due date of any premium payment in default after premiums have been paid for at least three full years in the case of ordinary insurance or five full years in the case of industrial insurance, the company will pay, in lieu of any paid-up nonforfeiture benefit, a cash surrender value of such amount as may be hereinafter specified;

"(3) that a specified paid-up nonforfeiture benefit shall become effective as specified in the policy unless the person entitled to make such election elects another available option not later than 60 days after the due date of the premium in default.

"(4) that, if the policy shall become paid up by completion of all premium payments or if it is continued under any paid-up nonforfeiture benefit which became effective on or after the third policy anniversary in the case of ordinary insurance or the fifth policy anniversary in the case of industrial insurance, the company will pay, upon surrender of the policy within 30 days after any policy anniversary, a cash surrender value of such amount as may be hereinafter specified;

"(5) a statement of the mortality table and interest rate used in calculating the cash surrender values and the paid-up nonforfeiture benefits available under the policy, together with a table showing the cash surrender value, if any, and paid-up nonforfeiture benefit, if any, available under the policy on each policy anniversary either during the first twenty policy years or during the term of the policy, whichever is shorter, such values and benefits to be calculated upon the assumption that there are no dividends or paid-up additions credited to the policy and that there is no indebtedness to the company on the policy;

"(6) a brief and general statement of the method to be used in calculating the cash surrender value and the paid-up nonforfeiture benefit available under the policy on any policy anniversary beyond the last anniversary for which such values and benefits are consecutively shown in the policy, with an explanation of the manner in which the cash surrender values and the paid-up nonforfeiture benefits are altered by the existence of any paid-up additions credited to the policy or any indebtedness to the company on the policy.

"Any of the foregoing provisions or portions thereof not applicable by reason of the plan of insurance may, to the extent inapplicable, be omitted from the policy.

"The company shall reserve the right to defer the payment of any cash surrender value for a period of 6 months after demand therefor with surrender of the policy.

"(b) Any cash surrender value available under any policy referred to in subsection (a) in the event of default in a premium payment due on any policy anniversary, whether or not required by subsection (a), shall be an amount not less than the excess, if any, of the present value, on such anniversary, of the future guaranteed benefits which would have been provided for by the policy, including any existing paid-up additions, if there had been no default, over the sum of (i) the then present value of the adjusted premiums as defined in subsection (d), corresponding to premiums which would have fallen due on and after such anniversary, and (ii) the amount of any indebtedness to the company on the policy. Any cash surrender value available within 30 days after any policy anniversary under any policy paid up by completion of all premium payments or any policy continued under any paid-up nonforfeiture benefit, whether or not required by subsection (a), shall be an amount not less than the present value, on such anniversary, of the future guaranteed benefits provided for by the policy, including any existing paid-up additions, decreased by any indebtedness to the company on the policy.

"(c) Any paid-up nonforfeiture benefit available under any policy referred to in subsection (a), in the event of default in a premium payment due on any policy anniversary shall be such that its present value as of such anniversary shall be at least equal to the cash surrender value then provided for by the policy or, if none is provided for, that cash surrender value which would have been required by this section in the absence of the condition that premiums shall have been paid for at least a specified period.

"(d) The adjusted premiums for any policy referred to in subsection (a) shall be calculated on an annual basis and shall be such uniform percentage of the respective premiums specified in the policy for each policy year, excluding amounts stated in the policy as extra premiums to cover impairments or special hazards, that the present value, at the date of issue of the policy, of all such adjusted premiums shall be equal to the sum of (i) the then present value of the future guaranteed benefits provided for by the policy; (ii) 2 percent of the amount of insurance, if the insurance be uniform in amount, or of the equivalent uniform amount, as hereinafter defined, if the amount of insurance varies with duration of the policy, (iii) 40 percent of the adjusted premium for the first policy year, (iv) 25 percent of either the adjusted premium for the first policy year or the adjusted premium for a whole life policy of the same uniform or equivalent uniform amount with uniform premiums for the whole of life issued at the same age for the same amount of insurance, whichever is less: Provided, however, That in applying the percentages specified in (iii) and (iv) above, no adjusted premium shall be deemed to exceed 4 percent of the amount of insurance or level amount equivalent thereto.

"In the case of a policy providing an amount of insurance varying with duration of the policy, the equivalent level amount thereof for the purpose of this subsection shall be deemed to be the level amount of insurance provided by an otherwise similar policy, containing the same endowment benefit or benefits, if any, issued at the same age and for the same term, the amount of which does not vary with duration and the benefits under which have the same present value at the date of issue as the benefits under the policy.

"All adjusted premiums and present values referred to in this section shall be calculated on the basis of the Commissioners 1941 Standard Ordinary Mortality Table for Ordinary Insurance and the 1941 Standard Industrial Mortality Table for Industrial Insurance and the rate of interest, not exceeding 3½ percent per annum, specified in the policy for calculating cash-surrender values, if any, and paid-up nonforfeiture benefits: Provided, however, That in calculating the present value of any paid-up term insurance with accompanying pure endowment, if any, offered as a nonforfeiture benefit, the rates of mortality assumed may be not more than 130 percent of the rates of mortality according to such applicable table: Provided, further, That for insurance issued on a substandard basis, the calculation of any such adjusted premiums and present values may be based on such other table of mortality as may be specified by the company and approved by the Superintendent.

"(e) Any cash surrender value and any paid-up nonforfeiture benefit, available under any such policy in the event of default in the payment of any premium due at any time other than on the policy anniversary, shall be calculated with allowance for the lapse of time and payment of fractional permiums beyond the last preceding policy anniversary. All values referred to in subsections (b), (c), and (d) may be calculated upon the assumption that any death benefit is payable at the end of the policy or contract year of death. The net value of any paid-up additions, other than paid-up term additions, shall be not less than the dividends used to provide such additions. Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (b), additional benefits payable (i) in the event of death or dismemberment by accident or accidental means, (ii) in the event of total and permanent disability, (iii) as reversionary annuity or deferred reversionary annuity benefits, (iv) as decreasing term insurance benefits provided by a rider or supplemental policy provision to which, if issued as a separate policy, this section would not apply, and (v) as other policy benefits additional to life insurance and endowment benefits, and premiums for all such additional benefits, shall be disregarded in ascertaining cash-surrender values and nonforfeiture benefits required by this section, and no such additional benefits shall be required to be included in any paid-up nonforfeiture benefits.

"(f) This section shall not apply to any reinsurance, group insurance, pure endowment, annuity or reversionary-annuity contract, nor to any term policy of uniform amount, or renewal thereof, of 15 years or less expiring before age 66, for which uniform premiums are payable during the entire term of the policy, nor to any term policy of decreasing amount on which each adjusted premium, calculated as specified in subsection (d), is less than the adjusted premium so calculated, on such 15-year term policy issued at the same age and for the same initial amount of insurance, nor to any policy or contract which shall be delivered outside the District of Columbia through an agent or other representative of the company issuing the policy.

"(g) After the effective date of this act, any company may file with the Superintendent a written notice of its election to comply with the provisions of this section after a specified date before January 1, 1950. After the filing of such notice, then upon such specified date (which shall be the operative date for such company), this section shall become operative with respect to the policies and contracts thereafter issued by such company. If a company makes no such election, the operative date of this section for such company shall be January 1, 1950."

"SEC. 5c. Loan provisions in policies: (a) In the case of ordinary policies issued prior to the operative date of section 5b (the standard nonforfeiture law) of this chapter the loan value referred to in provision (6) of section 3 of this chapter shall be the reserve at the end of the current policy year on the policy and on the dividend additions thereto, if any, exclusive of the reserve on account of return premium insurance and of total and permanent disability and additional accidental death benefits, less a sum not more than 2½ percent of the amount insured by the policy and of any dividend additions thereto (the policy to specify the mortality table and rate of interest adopted for computing such reserve). The policy may provide that such loan may be deferred for not exceeding 6 months after the application therefor is made. A company may, in lieu of the provision hereinabove permitted for the deduction from a loan on the policy of a sum not more than 2½ percent of the amount insured by the policy and of any dividend additions thereto, insert in the policy a provision that one-fifth of the said reserve may be deducted in case of a loan under the policy, or may provide therein that the deduction may be the said 2½ percent or the one-fifth of the said reserve at the option of the company.

"(b) In the case of ordinary policies issued on or after the operative date of section 5b (the standard nonforfeiture law) of this chapter the loan value referred to in provision (6) of section 3 of this chapter shall be the cash surrender value at the end of the current policy year as required by section 5b of this chapter. The company shall reserve the right to defer such loan, except when made to pay premiums, for 6 months after application therefor is made."

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I might state for the information of the membership that by the action taken in passing this bill we are bringing the District of Columbia in line with most of the jurisdictions of the country in adopting certain new mortality standards for the District. These are already compulsory in 25 States and are permissive in 12 others and will be of real general benefit to the entire insurance industry.

There is some $873,000,000 worth of effective insurance in the District of Columbia at the present time. This bill proposes to make effective new mortality tables based upon later years so that there may be credit for all the skill and advance that have been made adding to longevity. This in turn will spell out in terms of benefit for all of the policyholders.

It has been prepared under the direction of the Advisory Committee of the industry and it comes here without controversy and with the recommendation of the Commissioners and the Superintendent of Insurance.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the distinguished chairman of this committee if it is not a fact that it has been some 60 years since the mortality rates for the District of Columbia have been revised.

Mr. DIRKSEN. As a matter of fact, it has been 68 years since the mortality tables have been revised.

Mr. HARRIS. And this proposal brought to the House today is for the purpose of bringing the mortality tables down to date in line with States of the Union which have mortality rates fixed in recent years, and in line with those States where such tables are permissive.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. RICH. This, then, conforms more closely to the standards that have been adopted by the majority of the States.

Mr. DIRKSEN. And brings it up to date.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a radio address.

Mr. SHORT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House on Wednesday, June 11, following the business of the day and the special orders that may have been entered heretofore for that day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

PROVIDING REVENUE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3737) to provide revenue for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and pending that, Mr. Speaker, I should like to arrange with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS], who for the moment is the ranking minority member of the committee on the floor, with respect to time. I respectfully suggest that perhaps 2 hours of general debate equally divided between both sides will be ample, after which, of course, there will be abundant time to examine the various sections under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 2 hours, the time to be equally divided.

Mr. HARRIS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker; as I understand, this is an omnibus bill, a revision of the tax laws of the District of Columbia. There is likely to be quite a lot of debate. There are many Members who have manifested quite an interest in it.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. Is the so-called sales tax embodied in this bill?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I can enter into no controversy with respect to the merits of the bill. At the moment we are trying to fix a limitation of time.

Mr. SABATH. Before I can consent to a limitation such as asked for by the gentleman from Illinois I wish to be informed as to whether the bill includes a sales tax.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill as presented to the House does not include a sales tax provision. We understand, however, that some Members have under consideration a proposal to include a sales tax by way of amendment. We have no control over that, of course. I personally have no objection to a time limit of 2 hours if it is equally divided.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are many Members interested in the provision which would penalize the residents of certain States that do not have an income-tax law. I refer to people temporarily residing in the District of Columbia coming from States that do not have an income-tax law. Is that provision to be discussed or has it been put into this bill?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, that provision will be abundantly discussed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Obviously a quorum is not present.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE POTATOES

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee To Investigate the Potato Situation may sit today during the general debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA INCOME AND FRANCHISE TAX ACT OF 1947

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3737).

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3737) to provide revenue for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, with Mr. ARENDS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, today the House will consider a revenue bill for the District of Columbia. Before yielding to the chairman of the subcommittee that handled this bill I wish to indicate a few highlights by way of preliminary.

When the President's budget message came to the Congress in January there was included a budget for the District of Columbia—that is a budget for the seat of government—for the fiscal year 1948. That budget indicated a deficit between expenditures and revenues for the District of Columbia of some $10,500,000. So it became the responsibility of the Congress, since the District is absolutely and entirely dependent upon the Congress for policy legislation and for revenues, to devise ways and means of finding the funds whereby this deficit could be cured.

The Commissioners, who are the executive heads for the District of Columbia, worked out a program that was embodied in some 9 or 10 bills. Those bills were forwarded to me, and in my capacity as chairman of the committee they were introduced. They related to additional revenues from gasoline, amusements, electrical energy, telephone bills, and a variety of services, and included also a proposal for a 2-percent sales tax.

On innovation was developed this year. We contrived with the Senate to hold joint instead of separate hearings upon this revenue measure. A joint committee of the House and the Senate thereupon held extensive hearings, and this work really got under way in January of 1947. They have been at it for a long time, and they made a very exhaustive exploration of this whole matter. They have followed this with the aid of the Census Bureau, the budget officer, and of the Commissioners, and every type of information with respect to revenue and expenditures in the hope that they could contrive a very sound fiscal program not only for the fiscal year 1948 but for the fiscal year 1949 with a minimum of tax devices.

This bill is presented to you today as the fruit of the work of this subcommittee. In my capacity as chairman, I want to commend to the House, the chairman, and the members of that subcommittee, the chairman and the members of the Senate committee. After all, it is a labor of love. They have given freely of their time for more than 4 months for the purpose of devising the bill that is presented today; and I think it is owing to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES], who has had a wealth of experience in the whole field of municipal finance and who was at one time fiscal adviser to some 39 communities in the eastern section of the country, who has given so freely of his time and who has studied so diligently and so thoroughly in the hope that a tax program could be devised that was sound, that would generate the necessary revenues, and that would have that degree of practicability that it could be applied over the years. So, with that in mind, I recommend to you the bill which the subcommittee has reported and on which the District Committee took action.

I shall yield some time now to the gentleman who has given so freely of his time and who merits not only the credit of those in the Congress, since this committee is an agency and an honor to the Congress, but it does merit the appreciation and credit of the people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Does the bill contain a sales tax?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No; but I can say to the gentleman from Michigan that some effort may be made to insert one. This I can say informally, since I have taken judicial notice of the fact that a proposal to include a sales tax may be offered.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Ilinois.

Mr. CHURCH. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORAN] intends to offer a sales-tax proposal. That has been well known for some time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Chairman was advised that potentially was ahead of us, but I did not feel it incumbent upon me to name the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one additional minute.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HORAN. I intend to offer the so-called Dirksen bill, I may say.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I should say in explanation thereof that when the Commissioners message bills to the Congress it is the policy of the chairman of the committee to introduce those bills whether they represent his viewpoint or not. That is one of the responsibilities that the chairman of this committee has.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES].

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, may I say at the outset that this is the tax or revenue bill for the District of Columbia. As we all know, the legislative functions for the District of Columbia are embraced within the authority of Congress.

At the beginning of the year, because of the very distressing financial condition the District was facing, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who are the administrators of the District, found it necessary, in order that they might be able to balance the budget for the fiscal year 1948 which starts on July 1 next and also for succeeding years, to recommend nine different new sources of revenue.

One of those sources was the so-called income tax on individuals and on unincorporated business, the estimated yield to be about $3,150,000; a sales tax of 2 percent on taxable items that would yield an estimated $9,000,000; a tax on alcoholic beverages that would yield an estimate of $2,800,000; a tax on gasoline, increasing it from 3 cents to 4 cents, yielding $1,500,000; an increase in the inspection fee on motor vehicles and trailers from 50 cents to $1, to yield $65,000; an excise tax on cigarettes at 1 cent per package of 20 cigarettes, yielding an estimate of $800,000; and an amusement tax of 10 percent, which would yield $1,000,000; an excise tax on gas, electric, and telephone bills of 2 percent that would yield another $1,000,000, and a payment by the Federal Government for the water that we use, supplied by the District Government, that will yield an estimated revenue of $850,000. The sum total of those nine different sources of revenue would yield altogether approximately $20,298,000.

The reason the Commissioners recommended this tax program was to meet the constantly increasing cost of government in the District. When we stop to think that the District of Columbia, like all other large tax jurisdictions, is faced with ever-increasing costs, not only of personnel but material and everything else that goes into the operation of a community, we find justification for an increase in revenues.

As we look back over the record of the last 10 years from 1937 to 1948 we find that the expenditures in the District have increased from $42,759,000 in 1937 to an estimate of $97,457,000 in 1948, an increase of $54,698,000, or an increase in 10 years of 127 percent.

During the last 3 years alone, as the result of salary increases imposed on the District by Congress, we had to make allowance in the Budget for approximately $11,000,000. Together with the increased cost of operating the District in other respects, we found that we faced in the year 1948 a deficit of $10,494,693. The year 1949 we found we would be facing a deficit of over $12,181,787, and as we went into the year 1950 we were facing a deficit of $20,699,000.

Now, because of this condition that the District faced, your committee thought it would be the proper thing to make a complete exploration of the administration of the District for the past 10 years. To that end we held extensive hearings. We have gone most minutely into the operation and the cost of every department of the District in order to lay the groundwork for what was the reason for the increased cost of government down through that period of time. We came to the conclusion that a good deal of it was unavoidable because of the increases in the labor costs, in the material cost, in the expansion of municipal services, and we also came to the conclusion that by and large the District, operated by the Commissioners, was being carried on in a rather efficient manner. But, having in mind that we were face to face with these deficits, we had to do something about it.

The present source of revenue, it was felt, would not be sufficient, and to that end we had to devise some means by which those deficits could be taken care of and the essential purposes be maintained for a growing community. We must consider also that in the period of only 11 years we have seen an expansion of the highway system, new roads, from 1937, when we then had 826 miles of road with an average width of 30 feet whereas in 1948 we will have 990 miles of road with an average width of 30 feet. So, considering all of those matters we had to make a complete objective study as to what should be done to put this city on a paying basis in order to make its income equal its outgo, or in other words in order that we may meet the expenses of government. To that end we have given a great deal of thought and study to the many suggested revenues offered by the Commissioners, which embrace the various methods of revenue that I read to you a moment ago.

We came to the conclusion that we ought not to embrace a multiplicity of taxes; that we ought to concentrate, if we could, on the most basic of all taxes, and then determining whether or not from those most basic of all taxes sufficient revenues could be developed to meet the operating expenses of the District.

Now, what are the most basic of all taxes in any community? First of all, we know that the real estate tax since time immemorial, has been the major tax in any community. We know also that the income tax is one of the basic taxes in this and many other tax jurisdictions. We know that if we cannot develop sufficient revenues from those most basic of all taxes, that then we ought to go into the so-called emergency field to develop other taxes to meet the expenses of government.

So, we did consider whether or not in the District of Columbia the real estate tax was fair and equitable, and we came to the conclusion that an increase in the real estate tax in the District of Columbia was very justifiable from almost every angle; from the standpoint of fairness, the equalization of the tax level, and the comparison that real estate here pays with other communities of the country. We know as a result of the study of the tax systems in these other large cities of the country, that we have explored into very thoroughly, that the tax load on the real estate taxpayers in the District is below that of any of the large communities of over 500,000 population in the country, so we feel that from that viewpoint, and from the viewpoint of spreading the tax, that real estate, which has not suffered any increase in the tax rate from 1937 up to the present time, ought to be increased from $1.75 per $100 to $2 per $100.

We are not unmindful of the recent increase in the valuation that has taken place in the District. As to what relation that new assessment of values would bear to the fair market today, we find that in the District of Columbia, with the revised value, the ratio between the assessed value and the actual value is about 70 percent. We have always been led to believe that property in the District was assessed at 100 percent of its actual value, but the reports I have received from the assessors themselves show that the average ratio on business property, apartment houses, and residential properties in the District approximates 70 percent, the ratio of assessed value to what we might say is the market value as of today.

Then we go into the question of adjusted rates compared with all these other 11 cities of 500,000 population and more, and we find that even on the adjusted rate the District of Columbia is still, with one exception, lower than any one of those cities of 500,000 population. Therefore, we have recommended an increase in the tax rate of 25 cents a hundred, that will bring the rate up to $2 a hundred on the 70 percent value.

In addition, we have recommended revision in the income tax that will yield the District approximately $3,100,000. That tax will be assessed on every resident of the District who has resided here for a period of 7 months or resides here on the last day of the taxable year.

Then we feel, in addition to the real-estate tax, in order to adjust the deficit in what we call the general fund, that the Federal Government itself has an obligation to the District of Columbia for the many services it has rendered and is still rendering, and also as a result of the great expansion in carrying through many expensive projects in the Capital City of the Nation. To that end we have recommended an increase of $4,000,000 in the Federal contribution, that is now $8,000,000, and that $1,000,000 of the $4,000,000 be credited to the water fund in repayment for the water the Federal Government now uses in the District.

Further, Mr. Chairman, we are adopting the recommendation of the Commission for an increase in the inspection fee from 50 cents to a dollar, which will bring in about $65,000 a year.

We are also recommending an increase in the gasoline tax from 3 cents to 4 cents. When we stop to consider the tremendous expansion that is now taking place in the capital outlay, that is heavy expenditures for streets, for bridges, and everything else of major consequence in the Highway Department we feel that over and above the ordinary expenses of maintenance and operations we must allow additional revenue to carry through the major projects in this department. The gasoline fund and the inspection fee, upon which they depend primarily, are insufficient to meet their requirements today. We are convinced as a result of thorough study of the finances of the Highway Department that unless we are able to get increased revenue through an increase in the gasoline tax from 3 to 4 cents, many of the major projects will have to stop, such as the highway bridges and the Dupont Circle project. We must provide more revenue and the only way we could find to do that was through an increase of 1 cent per gallon tax on gasoline. The tax of 4 cents will be lower than in either of the adjacent States, where today it is 5 cents in the State of Maryland and 6 cents in the State of Virginia.

Mr. Chairman, that in brief outlines the program for the tax bill in the District of Columbia. I know other Members are going to speak on this very important question. We feel it ought to be thoroughly analyzed from every point of view, but we should keep in mind that the basic taxes on real estate, income, and the Federal contribution in the District of Columbia will meet all the requirements of the District for the next 2 years. I see no reason why we should embark upon a program of developing any other sources of emergency revenue when all the needs can be met from these basic taxes.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BENDER. In my own State we have a sales tax of 3 cents on the dollar. Has the sales tax been abandoned in the District of Columbia?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. We have no sales tax in the District of Columbia. It was recommended, but as I said at the outset, if the basic tax on real estate and the Federal contribution and income tax will meet all the requirements of the District, certainly there is no need to develop other sources of revenue.

Mr. BENDER. We have a valuation of 100 percent on our real estate for the purposes of taxation. Do you say it averages about 70 percent here in the District of Columbia?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I have in my hand, Mr. Chairman, a statement prepared by Mr. Dent, Chairman of the Board of Assessors in the District of Columbia, with reference to the assessed value of all properties that have been sold during the last 2-year period, involving several hundred business properties, apartment houses, and residential properties, and his figures show that the ratio of assessed value to the present market value in the District of Columbia is about 70 percent. He agrees with this and he so testified before the committee.

Mr. BENDER. When was the last general reappraisal of real estate here in the District?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I believe way back prior to 1937, possibly 1930.

Mr. BENDER. How about the personal property tax? Do they have any personal property tax in the District?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The same rate applies to personal property—not income, but personal property. They have the same local rate.

Mr. BENDER. You say the last general reappraisal was in 1930?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. About 1930. There has been none since 1937.

Mr. BENDER. That is, there was a reappraisal of some kind in 1937?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. No; this year is the first time in 10 years that there has been a revaluation in the District.

Mr. BENDER. That is, there has been a revaluation of all the property?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. This is the first year. The adjusted rate today is lower with one exception than in any of those communities of over 500,000 population.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, nobody loves a tax bill, but they are necessary evils. In the District of Columbia you are confronted with a situation that has to be met. The budget is confronted with a deficit of $10,500,000. Everybody in Washington and in the Congress admits that in the Nation's Capital we have the best, and there is always complaint when anything occurs here that indicates we do not have the best. You cannot have the best unless you are going to pay for it. We have to raise $10,500,000 of additional revenue. It does not make anybody happy to have to impose taxes. It does not make me happy. So when, at the beginning of this session the Subcommittee on Fiscal Affairs met with a similar subcommittee of the Senate we had before us some ten alternative proposals. The most important of those proposals was the alternative whether you are going to have a sales tax of whether you are going to raise revenue out of income tax that would bring in more revenue than the present income tax.

I think the House is confronted with that proposition of whether you want a sales tax or whether you want to adjust this income tax so as to make it fair to everybody, and not permit any more tax dodgers on income earned in the District of Columbia. It seems to me that is the simple proposition. If you want a sales tax, you can have it, but you have got to have something.

After very mature consideration and after weeks, and I might say months, of hearings on this complicated proposition, this committee selected the items in this bill, the most important of which is the income tax. Then we have an increase in the gasoline tax. This is a rounded proposition to raise the necessary revenue to operate the Nation's Capital as you and the Nation want it operated. If you do not want to raise the revenue to operate it as it should be operated, then you can say so today, and the responsibility is on the House. This committee has done 3 months of work on this matter and has presented to you what we think is a fair program. That committee sat day after day, busy Members of the Senate and of this House, and we invited every organization, business and otherwise, and every individual in the District who had any interest in this study, to come forward and express their views; and they did so in numbers and at length.

Now, having gone through with all that work and having perfected a program which we tell you we think is fair and just and the best program we can present, the question before this House is, Are you going to accept that program or are you going to throw it in the ash can?

Now it is up to the House. So far as I know, I do not think there is much controversy except about two items in this bill, and I want to talk about those two items briefly.

One item is raising the gasoline tax in the District of Columbia from 3 to 4 cents. We hear a howl about that. Well, of course, traditionally, everybody howls when you place a tax on them. But let us analyze this objection to the gasoline tax in the District of Columbia. I think before you vote on that matter you ought to know and seriously consider the fact that the District of Columbia has the lowest gasoline tax in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] has expired.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Can you think of any good reason why the District of Columbia, which is supposed to be the best operated and the most expensively operated city in the Nation, and we want it so—can you think of any reason why this District should have the lowest gasoline tax in the United States? I do not enjoy paying 1 cent additional gasoline tax any more than the rest of you do, but I think we have to consider this matter on the basis of what is fair and right and honest and just. I wonder if you Members know what happens about this gasoline tax. Do you ever see these great big trucks rolling up and down the roads between Florida and New York? And did you ever notice that great big barrel that holds 50 gallons of extra gasoline that is attached on the side of the truck? And do you ever stop to consider why it is there? I will tell you why it is there. It is there so that those trucks which are using the highways of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Maryland, Delaware, and New York—it is put there so they can dodge the gasoline tax in those States whose highways they are using and wearing out. Is that fair? Is that just? Is that what you believe to be honest and right?

Now, why, why should the District of Columbia enjoy the lowest gasoline tax in the United States when all this money is needed and has got to be had if you are going to have your highways and your bridges in the District of Columbia as they ought to be?

This fund is absolutely essential to the program laid down for the construction of highways and bridges in the District of Columbia over the next few years. If you want those highways and bridges you have got to have the tax to pay for them. If you are going to get the tax you have got to raise the gasoline tax from 3 to 4 cents. That is all there is to it. If you want to strike it out that is up to you. It makes no personal difference to the members of the committee whether you do or not.

Mr. SPRINGER Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. SPRINGER. As a matter of fact with this low gasoline tax in the District of Columbia it is eminently unfair to all the surrounding territory, is it not?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. It is unfair to all the States on the Atlantic seaboard, yes; because, as I say these big trucks carry these supplemental gas tanks, load them up in the District of Columbia, and do not pay any tax in the various States through which they operate.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. SPRINGER. And, as a matter of fact, the District of Columbia not receiving enough tax money to take care of her roads, highways, and bridges, they then call upon the people from the various States of the Union to make a contribution by way of taxation to make up the deficit. Is not that true?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I think it is the other way around. I just think these improvements will not be made unless the money to pay for them is raised out of the gasoline tax, because it is specifically set aside by law for that purpose.

Mr. SPRINGER. The improvements will not be made if the rest of the States are required to make their contribution.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. That would be true.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. The gentleman, of course, knows that no Federal contribution is made to the District highway fund. Is not that true?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. That is true except for the matching fund.

Mr. HARRIS. Except for the matching fund which is apportioned to the District of Columbia under the law just as it is apportioned to the various States of the Union.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. That is right.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the gentleman what is the gas tax in Maryland and Virginia?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. It is 6 cents in Virginia and 5 in Maryland.

Mr. DIRKSEN. By virtue of a recent order signed by the Governor of Maryland it is now 5 cents.

And whereas the tax in the District has been 3, it is proposed to increase it by 1 cent until 1952.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. I understand that the 3-cent rate for the District was fixed during the war, that prior thereto it was 2 cents. Am I right?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Yes; I think that is true.

Mr. DIRKSEN. And I might say that under existing law the 3-cent rate continues until 1951.

Mr. HARRIS. It would were it not for this bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. In this bill it goes up to 4 cents until 1951.

Mr. HARRIS. 1952, is it not?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; I believe it is 1952.

Mr. HARRIS. Can the gentleman from Virginia tell me what the registration fee is in the State of Virginia?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. The gentleman has asked me something I cannot answer.

Mr. HARRIS. Can the gentleman tell me whether or not there is any difference in the registration fee in Virginia as compared with the District of Columbia?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No; I cannot.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. There is one additional feature of the bill I wish to touch, and that is the one dealing with the income tax. I do not know of any controversy over this or objection to it with the one exception of the person who claims domicile elsewhere. Here is what the bill would provide: If a person pays an income tax in another State then he is given credit for that income tax and does not have to pay an income tax in the District of Columbia.

As the District of Columbia will have under this bill the lowest income tax in the country the result is that any person who claims domicile elsewhere and pays his income tax there does not pay any income tax in the District of Columbia. I wonder who will argue that is not fair? Why should not persons pay an income tax somewhere? If they live in the District of Columbia, if they educate their children here, if they enjoy the services of the finest city in the world, why should they not pay this slight income tax if they do not pay it anywhere else? Why should they not pay it to the District of Columbia? I would like somebody to answer that question when we get into the debate.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. That proposition also applies to persons having intangible property here.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Yes. If the State in which the persons claim domicile has an income tax or an intangible property tax they get credit for that and do not have to pay it in the District.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. The gentleman stated that a person residing in the District of Columbia would get credit for a tax paid in another State in which he might claim domicile. Does the gentleman mean to say that he would not have to pay any tax in the District then?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. They would be credited with the amount of the income tax they paid in the other State. If they pay it in another State they would not pay any in the District of Columbia because the income-tax laws in other States are all higher than the proposed income-tax law in the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. O'HARA].

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Chairman, of course, this tax bill does raise the tax rate for the purpose of financing the District of Columbia and applies to real estate, water, and gas. It broadens the base of the income tax and increases the Federal contribution.

It is a great pleasure to me to follow the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH], particularly upon that phase of the income-tax bill which is made effective by this law. To begin with I would like to advise the House that under this bill Members of Congress, Cabinet officers, and appointive officers of the President are specifically exempted. So there will be no question about that and you will understand that is so. But anyone else in the District of Columbia is not exempted.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. Is it not a fact that the language in the bill specifically exempts elective officers?

Mr. O'HARA. That is right.

Mr. HARRIS. And those appointed by the President and Cabinet officers?

Mr. O'HARA. That is right.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. The language in the bill does not specifically exempt elective officers.

Mr. O'HARA. It so states.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think what the gentleman from Illinois has reference to is this: He thinks there ought to be clarification. It has been generally agreed, and I think it is the intent and the interpretation of the corporation counsel and every member of the committee that the language is specific. But the amendment that the gentleman from Illinois has indicated to me as clarifying is not objectionable. Certainly if there is any doubt there can be no objection to the clarifying language.

Mr. O'HARA. I am not any more concerned about Members of Congress than I am those who are working down here on our staff and the people in the Government down here who are going to be harassed to pay taxes whether they pay them at home or not. My point is this: If we are going to except ourselves because we are down here as officers of the Government the employees ought to have the same consideration. I shall offer an amendment at the proper time to take care of that little matter.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. For the sake of clarification, the income tax is on the books at the present time, and it was adopted by Congress to apply to the District in 1939, and specifically exempts elective officers. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. O'HARA. That is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Secondly, it applies to people who are resident here, and that the difficulties arise from a clarification of residence in domicile, and what this tries to do, in view of some 300 court cases and thousands of cases in the assessor's office, is merely to clarify it, and it adds not one bit, of course, to harassment or the difficulties that tax collection implies.

Mr. O'HARA. The gentleman can argue that at the proper time, but I would like to proceed with my views.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HORAN. I would like to know if any estimates of additional cost of collecting or administering this income tax have been made to the subcommittee.

Mr. O'HARA. Well, I have had none. Perhaps the gentleman from Massachusetts has some information. Actually this is his bill; I mean he was on the joint committee of the House and the Senate and did a tremendous amount of work. It started out to be a joint Senate and House committee, but it ended up with the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES], and, finally, I think it was the gentleman from Massachusetts who did the greater part of the work, and I now yield to him for an answer.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. There would be practically no increase in cost because we have today the income-tax law in the District of Columbia, and the administration is set up here already to take on whatever responsibility would come under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. O'HARA. I understand that the income tax here has sort of been run on an honor basis. The people were paid, but they did not go out after them as they probably will under this bill.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. There was administration enough to yield $9,000,000 under the present law.

Mr. HORAN. I might say that the testimony before our subcommittee was that we will have to have an increase in the force, and a considerable increase in appropriations, if this income tax as presently written is enacted into law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SPRINGER. As I recall, the distinguished gentleman who is now addressing the House introduced a measure in the last Congress, and perhaps in the Seventy-eighth Congress also, to free the employees of the necessity of paying an income tax in the District of Columbia when they were paying an income tax back in their home communities. Is the gentleman now certain that the provisions of this bill will reach that objective which the gentleman had in mind when he introduced his bill?

Mr. O'HARA. This bill provides, and in fact the language, if you read it, includes every one of your office staff, because it says that if they maintain a place of abode within the District of Columbia for more than 7 months of the taxable year, whether domiciled in the District of Columbia or not, that they shall be liable for taxes. The only exemption that this bill takes care of is elective officers and the Members of the Cabinet.

The point I wanted to make in answer to the gentleman's question is this. I introduced what was known as H. R. 3592. It went before the Committee on the Judiciary and passed the House on March 27, 1944. That bill did exempt officers or employees who were working for the Government and who were legally domiciled back home, and that bill was passed by the House. It was passed, I might say, unanimously out of the Committee on the Judiciary. It was granted a rule. We had extended debate here in the House. It was opposed, incidentally, by a few Members from Maryland at that time. It passed the House and went to the Senate. The Senate never acted upon it.

Then again an identical bill, H. R. 534, passed on the Consent Calendar in 1945. It went to the Senate and was amended by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD]. It came back here and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] objected to sending it to conference. It went to the Rules Committee, of which he was a member, and was locked up there the rest of the time.

Mr. SPRINGER. As a matter of fact, in States where these employees are paying income tax, or a gross income tax, or whatever it is called, they should not be called upon to pay a similar tax here because that would amount to double taxation.

Mr. O'HARA. Of course. In some instances it amounts to triple taxation. I know of cases where Government employees live in the District of Columbia and are paying a tax back home. They work either in the State of Virginia or the State of Maryland, or vice versa. You can make it any combination you want. They get taxed in all three jurisdictions. It is an example of unjust multiple tax chasing. If you talk about communism, if you want to treat your Government employees like that and have a bunch of tax beagles out chasing them, the tax imposed may be $25, or $30, or $50, and those little people do not have the money to fight over that tax. They pay it. I think it is horribly unjust—horribly unjust.

Mr. SPRINGER. Our employees who come here from the various States and have to pay this tax back in our own States should not be called upon to pay any of this tax in the District of Columbia. This bill should be clarified to make that situation specific and certain.

Mr. O'HARA. Yes. I think it definitely should.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am sure my good friend from Minnesota will not contend that this bill imposes double taxation. It clearly seeks to clarify and define so as to avoid double taxation.

Mr. O'HARA. It does not do any such thing. It says definitely that if they are here 7 months they pay a tax.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let us get this thing clear so that there can be no confusion.

Mr. O'HARA. I do not think there is any confusion.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There are 32 States that have an income tax.

Mr. O'HARA. That is right. I shall read the 16 that do not have any income tax at all.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There are 16 that do not have an income tax. All the 32 that have income taxes have a rate that is higher than the District of Columbia. There can be no double assessment or taxation in those States. With respect to the 16 States, if they have an intangible tax, that is credited. If there is no income tax in the 16 States, then of course if these people come under the provision with reference to domicile or residence in this bill, they would be taxable here.

Mr. O'HARA. What is an intangible tax?

Mr. DIRKSEN. It might be any kind of a tax, on any kind of an intangible, a security, whatever it might be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHURCH. Let me say to the gentleman that people coming from Illinois pay the burden of Government when they pay the sales tax, which they do not have here in the District.

Mr. DIRKSEN. While they come from Illinois they are living in the Nation's Capital.

Mr. CHURCH. Many of them pay the sales tax, many of them pay the personal property tax. You have not exempted that burden on the little fellow who pays the sales tax in Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. My friend is thoroughly confused. You cannot pay a sales tax in Illinois unless the incidence of the purchase was in the State.

Mr. CHURCH. They are in Illinois for 5 months after the 7 months here. That is what the gentleman is speaking about.

Mr. O'HARA. I am speaking particularly of the income taxes.

Mr. CHURCH. You should have a sales tax, as you have in Illinois. They have not exempted the sales tax.

Mr. O'HARA. I did not intend to create any disagreement between Members from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It does not bother this gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. May I say for the benefit of the gentleman from Illinois that in my own State of Indiana we have a gross income tax, and those employees are required to pay a gross income tax on the salary they receive for their work down here.

Mr. O'HARA. Exactly.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right, and they would not pay here.

Mr. O'HARA. They do pay it here, and they have to pay it back in Indiana. That is the point.

Mr. DIRKSEN. So the gentleman's argument that there is double taxation here simply does not work out.

Mr. O'HARA. A Government employee who works down here, who may live in Virginia and work in the District of Columbia, is subject to the tax, or he may live in the District of Columbia and work in Virginia. He gets taxed here and back home.

Mr. DIRKSEN. He gets credit for it. He certainly does.

Mr. O'HARA. He does in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is certainly clear.

Mr. O'HARA. He gets credit for it, but still he is going to pay if the tax is less in his own State.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But he only pays one tax.

Mr. O'HARA. I yield to my friend the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ABERNETHY].

Mr. ABERNETHY. It has been said that they would pay no tax in the District of Columbia if they pay a tax in their home State, because the tax there is higher than that in the District of Columbia. May I ask my chairman this question. Let us suppose that the tax in my State is sometime in the future lowered to the extent that it is lower than the tax in the District of Columbia. Thereupon the people from my State working in the District would then pay a tax to the State of Mississippi as well as paying a tax to the District of Columbia. Is that right?

Mr. DIRKSEN. But the aggregate of the tax is only one maximum tax and not two taxes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. But the point is, the person would be paying taxes to two jurisdictions.

Mr. DIRKSEN. He pays one tax, and if there is any disparity, he pays in one jurisdiction or the other. But there is only one tax, and there is a reciprocal provision here to take care of that.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I disagree that it would be one tax because I can see in many instances where the tax might be lowered in the States and where the person would pay a tax in the State and also in the District of Columbia.

I know many people who maintain an apartment here but they actually reside in their apartments only 2, 3, or 4 months out of the year. They continue to maintain their apartments because of the tight rental situation at this time. In view of the fact that they are compelled to maintain their apartments, would they not be required to pay a tax to the District of Columbia, although they are here less than 7 months?

Mr. O'HARA. I would think so. I do not see how many of our own employees are going to be protected in that sort of situation. That is merely an example.

Mr. Chairman, my amendment is not for the purpose of permitting a tax dodger to get away. He cannot get away. He must pay his tax back home if there is a tax levied, or he pays it here in the District of Columbia. That is all there is to it.

Of course, the gentleman from Massachusetts knows a great deal about this, but I have lived with this problem quite a while. Permit me to call this fact to your attention.

There are 16 States that have no State income tax. The people from those States are going to be paying taxes here, and you can be sure about that. I will read the names of the States to you: Florida, Illinois, Maine, Michigan, Nebraska, New Jersey, Nevada, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Texas, West Virginia, Wyoming, and Connecticut.

Mr. RAMEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield.

Mr. RAMEY. The people in the State of Ohio in four of its largest cities pay a tax there.

Mr. O'HARA. Yes; that is the wage tax.

Mr. RAMEY. What about the exemptions there?

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield.

Mr. JENNINGS. Let us consider a case of this kind. Suppose there is a Member of Congress from whatever State it may be who employs a secretary who resides in that State and that secretary pays a Federal income tax on his or her salary or income. Under this law, does the secretary by virtue of the fact that the secretary may be domiciled here, not a citizen, but domiciled here in the District of Columbia say for 6 or 7 months, have to pay another Federal income tax?

Mr. O'HARA. May I say to my friend from Tennessee there is this limitation—that the word "resident" means every individual domiciled within the District on the last day of the taxable year and every other individual who maintains a place of abode within the District for more than 7 months.

Mr. JENNINGS. What is the last day of the taxable year?

Mr. O'HARA. I do not know just what day that would be.

Mr. JENNINGS. We ought to find out about that.

Mr. O'HARA. I think this is definitely the situation, as a practical matter, that our secretaries are going to be here for more than 7 months of the year, and I know that my office help certainly will be.

Mr. JENNINGS. They are citizens of another State who are temporarily here.

Mr. O'HARA. That is right. That is what this bill does not recognize. That is my point. They refuse to recognize the right of that individual to maintain his domicile where he wants it.

Mr. Chairman, I yield to my friend the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FORAND].

Mr. FORAND. The gentleman read a list of States that have no income tax. Is he aware of the fact that several of those States have no income tax because of a compromise of their State legislatures and they have imposed a sales tax and, therefore, there is a tax?

Mr. O'HARA. I understand that is true.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. As I understood the gentleman's reply to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JENNINGS], a person who is domiciled in the District of Columbia for more than 7 months or maintains a place where he can live for more than 7 months is obliged to pay taxes under this provision.

Mr. O'HARA. By the provisions of this act; yes.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. Members of Congress have been forced, in recent years, to maintain an apartment or a home here the year round.

Mr. O'HARA. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. Members of Congress may spend 5 or 6 months in their districts. Are the Members of Congress going to pay a tax here simply because they maintain a place to live?

Mr. O'HARA. Oh, no. The bill takes care of that. Members of Congress are exempted; but the little fellow, the Government employee, and the secretary is not exempted.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. That is what I am talking about. Secretaries have to maintain their homes in the District of Columbia and in the districts which we represent. Some of them maintain apartments here the year round.

Mr. O'HARA. That is correct.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. Are they going to pay a tax under this bill?

Mr. O'HARA. If they are here more than 7 months of the year, they are. If their tax back home is less, then they would have to pay here.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. That does not seem to be fair.

Mr. O'HARA. Of course it is not fair. There is nothing fair about it. Certainly it is a dishonest legislative process when we exempt ourselves but do not take care of the people who are down here for the same reason we are.

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield.

Mr. JENNINGS. It seems to me their status is exactly the status of a citizen of another State who is here as a transient. These people are transients. They are not residents of the District of Columbia. A person's residence is wherever in their mind they say it is for purposes of voting or for citizenship or for taxes. They are not residents of the District of Columbia and the Federal Government under no circumstances should have the power to toll the income of that person twice. They pay a Federal income tax. They ought not be subject to another Federal income tax for the support of anything here.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I cannot see but what a secretary, resident in a State that has no income tax, is being penalized under this bill. The per capita cost of government in the State of Connecticut, without any income tax, is just as great as the per capita cost of government in the neighboring State of Massachusetts which does have an income tax.

Mr. O'HARA. Exactly.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield.

Mr. BROOKS. What about the constitutionality of the State of Louisiana, for example, attempting to tax a transient from the District of Columbia, residing in the State of Louisiana? Do we have the right to levy an income tax on a nonresident in Louisiana or in your State?

Mr. O'HARA. Let me say to the gentleman that theory has been upheld by the courts. I regret to say that our theory of taxation and tax law has gone to the point where it is a tax dollar-chasing proposition. People who do not live within a State get taxed. In the city of Philadelphia they have what they call a wage tax. People who never lived there, but who work within the confines of the city, are assessed 2 percent of their wages. The principle I believe has been upheld by the court in the Northwestern Air Lines case, which went to the United States Supreme Court.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. O'HARA] has again expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, in considering the District of Columbia tax bill, I hope that we intend to be fair with the citizens of the District of Columbia, and at the same time, it is my intention to be just as fair with my constituents who pay a large share of their income to the Federal Government. This tax problem of the District of Columbia has always been a rather complex one to all of us. There should be no program adopted that would saddle a burden upon the people of Washington, but on the contrary the District of Columbia should not be a haven of tax dodgers.

Taxes are always a burden on any people, and the Supreme Court of the United States has aptly said that the "power to tax is the power to destroy." This statement of the Supreme Court applies as much to the taxpayers of Indiana as it does to the taxpayer in Washington, D. C. It is the problem of Congress to equalize this tax burden as much as possible and then keep it at the lowest possible level consistent with good government and sound business principles. I do not want the people of Washington, D. C., to pay any more taxes than do my constituents in Indiana, but on the other hand I do not want them to pay less taxes than the people in my congressional district, and at the same time, the Federal Government contribute to their budget. If they pay less taxes than my constituents and your constituents, and at the same time Congress contributes to the District of Columbia budget, we are in effect transferring that much of the cost of District government to our constituents as measured by the excess of tax which our constituents pay. That is not fair to our own people, the men and women who elect us to Congress.

The history of the gas tax and its distribution has been the subject of studies by this body upon many occasions. It is one element of the tax structure that can be easily understood. There may be some difference of opinion as to whether the people of the District of Columbia are carrying their share of the tax burden in some of its application, but there can be no dispute as to the gasoline tax.

An exhaustive study of this subject was made in 1940 and a report filed early in 1941, which went into the history of the gasoline-tax fund. That report carried a very thorough and carefully prepared letter by the then Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, Col. D. McCoach, Jr. The letter was dated June 5, 1940, and contained the following statement: "The increase in traffic resulting in constant justifiable demand for major highway improvements, the opening of new streets due to building operations, and the ever-increasing volume of traffic have placed a very great burden on this fund to meet and cope with the situation." He further advised that the Highway Department measure its work by the available money, and let the balance of the street-improvement work go undone. That has been happening for about 8 or 10 years, and especially during the war was needed repair work left undone, so that now the streets of Washington are in a deplorable condition. The need for major capital improvements in the Street and Highway Department is a colossal one as disclosed by the 6-year proposed Young plan of improvements.

Going back into the history of the gasoline fund as disclosed by the report made to this House in 1941, it is disclosed that this gasoline fund never did meet the needs of street work in Washington. Page 7 of this report discloses that during the period from 1924 to 1940 that street and highway improvements drew from the general fund about $42,035,447. At that time the city was much smaller than it is now and there was much less demand on this fund than there is now. The Highway Department in 1941 asked for an increase of 2 cents on the District of Columbia gasoline tax, which would have made it 4 cents, just as we are proposing to do now. The tax was increased in 1941 by 1 cent, making the total District tax 3 cents. I thought then, and I am convinced now, that we should have then raised the tax to 4 cents and we would now have accumulated a small backlog of funds to meet the improvements caused by our inability to do this work during the war period. Now, then, we are faced with a huge capital street, highway, and bridge program and must face it with a gasoline-tax fund practically empty. We now have only enough in this gasoline-tax fund, plus a 1-cent increase which we propose here to meet current needs. Where is the money coming from to meet capital street improvements? Is it coming from a Federal contribution which will be used to augment the gasoline fund, while we permit District of Columbia drivers to pay a less tax than our own constituents pay? That is just what we have done in the past 20 years of street operation.

Gentlemen, I say that is unfair to our own taxpayers. The average gasoline tax in this country is 4.6 cents per gallon State tax plus 1½ cents Federal tax, which is to say your constituents and mine pay an average of 6.1 cents tax, while the District of Columbia is now paying 4½ cents. Is that fair? I would have no objection if the District of Columbia did not need this additional gasoline tax money for road and street improvements. But when they do need it and do not contribute enough to pay their own street-improvement bill, and Federal funds must augment their dereliction, then it is time for you and me to do our duty by our own constituents. It is not properly spreading the tax burden for us to permit the people of the District to pay less taxes in a given field than do the citizens of your State and mine, and then make a Federal contribution to make up their lack of taxpaying. The true test of tax balance between the people of Washington, D. C., and the people of Indiana, Kansas, Oklahoma, Iowa, and all the other States, is to require them to contribute as much in taxes as do our people, and then the Federal Government make up the difference needed to balance their budget. The people of Washington have not shown a willingness to do that, and I for one am not in favor of going out of my way to help them until they are willing to get down to earth and really meet their own obligations.

Every interested official in the District Government is asking for a permanent gasoline tax of 4 cents per gallon. They are not certain that this will meet the need. In the light of this report which I hold in my hand, I am certain that it will not meet the need. As for me, if it does not, then the tax should be raised to 4.6 cents per gallon, and then the Federal Government contribute the balance needed to meet street repair and capital improvement work in Washington. Let us be fair about this whole matter. There is nothing complicated in the tax problem for Washington. It is one of equalizing the burden as between the District taxpayer and the constituents of the Members of this body. This is the Federal city, and it is my conviction that when the Washington, D. C., taxpayer pays his fair share of the burden, that the Federal Government should make up the balance. Until the District of Columbia taxpayer is willing to do that, then I am somewhat inclined to let him paddle his own canoe.

At least, the gasoline tax portion of this tax problem is a simple one. It amounts to balancing the burden of the District auto driver against the burden of the State driver, and the State driver's burden ranges from 4 cents to 7 cents. Certainly the District of Columbia driver cannot complain about a tax which is equivalent to the lowest tax out in the States. And especially is that true when the 4 cents will not give them all the street improvement money they need.

If you will take a look at page 8 of this report you will see that the District of Columbia officials have been recommending an increase in the gasoline tax to 4 cents since 1932. There has always been evidence of need for additional street funds, and much needed work has been left undone and the streets and bridges neglected until they become a menace and then, at times in the past, the Federal Government has provided the funds through contributions to the general fund of the District which have been diverted to the gasoline fund. That is the history of the past as disclosed by this report. I do not know what mechanics they have used to "mooch" on the Federal Government, but the "mooching" has been accomplished.

The principal "moochers" now are the gasoline station operators, who want to sell gasoline at the expense of Maryland and Virginia, and then have the Federal Government make up the difference in street work. At the time this subject was under consideration in 1941, representatives of the highway departments of both Virginia and Maryland appeared and asked that the difference between the gasoline tax be adjusted, especially since the District needed the money. They asked that the District quit robbing them of large sums of road money which they needed to repair roads leading into Washington.

This report deals with the situation in 1941, and it is much more acute now than it was then. The city is much larger; there are many more streets to repair, and in addition there is much capital improvement needed to solve traffic problems. Who is going to furnish the money for these needs? Will the people of the District of Columbia ask Congress to help build the bridges across the Potomac River, every foot of which lies within the District of Columbia, and at the same time bellyache about equalizing the gasoline tax when they need the money? I believe that the Federal Government should contribute to the cost of building these Potomac River bridges, but not unless and until the people of the District of Columbia are willing to pay their share of road-improvement tax. If they do not want to do that, then let them figure their own way to pay for these Potomac River bridges. It might be a good idea to put a good stiff sales tax on them to pay for these bridges. Finally, the solution of the tax problem is for Congress, and it is up to the people of the District of Columbia to be fair.

I will say, in justice to the people of Washington, D. C., that most of the civic organizations have come out in favor of a 4-cent gasoline tax in the District of Columbia. The Board of Trade, the automobile associations, and others have been fair about this matter. However, gasoline dealers prompted by selfish motives would rather sell more gasoline than be fair about a gasoline tax. The same is true of the Capital Transit Co. This Capital Transit Co. has already been granted an increase in fare and yet is not willing to pay its share of road-tax improvement. Capital does more to damage the streets in Washington than any other agency in the city, and still with selfish complacency is unwilling to pay its share of the cost of keeping up those streets. When the proof is so overwhelming that the money is needed, why does Capital Transit object?

I trust that Congress will equalize this burden between the State taxpayer and the District taxpayer, and then if more money is needed the Federal Government would be more inclined to listen to the appeal of such taxpayers as Capital Transit and gasoline dealers. Until then, I am deaf to their demands as they are unfair and unreasonable.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 7 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I did not have the privilege of serving on the subcommittee that acted on this bill. I have made an effort to study it since the bill was printed. Of course, I do not agree with some of the items in the bill. I do not think anybody can agree with every item in a bill of this magnitude.

I want to congratulate the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] on the hard work they did on this bill when it was under consideration. I cannot, however, agree with all the statements that have been made in support of the income tax and some of the other items. I will not, however, deal with the income-tax question, as I believe that has been very well thrashed out, but I would like to mention this gasoline tax.

If the Highway Department of the District of Columbia needs this tax at the present time, I would be for it, but we all know that the District of Columbia was privileged to spend $10,000,000 during the war on construction work here in Washington. In my State and in other States they were denied the privilege of constructing bridges or doing any type of heavy road work. Even at the present time in my own State the highway department is unable to get approval for a few bridges from the Bureau of Public Roads on account of the high cost of materials. If that is true in my State, I think it would likewise be true here in the city of Washington.

I think the highway department in Washington could wait at least 2 years to begin this over-all construction program. There is absolutely no reason in the world why they should pay the tremendously high prices they have to pay now for materials to build elevated highways in the city of Washington. They will not suffer any to wait until we have passed these critical reconstruction days following the war; and I expect to offer an amendment to cut out the increased tax on gasoline not because I do not think it would be needed in ordinary times but I think they can wait. I think that when the emergency is over we can well consider the matter at that time. The people of Washington who passed through the war years can certainly stand the traffic conditions for another two, or at least until prices decline somewhat.

There are several items in this highway program that I cannot understand. One, for instance, is their request for $1,- 800,000 for miscellaneous expenses. I do not believe any highway department can get away with a request for $1,800,000 without explaining what the money is to be expended for. Practically every street in the city of Washington is paved and I understand money has already been allocated for the building of these two bridges across the Potomac.

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. VURSELL. I am impressed by the argument the gentleman is making against an increase of the gasoline tax at the present time.

Is it not a fact that inasmuch as special privilege has been granted to the District of Columbia to expend $10,000,000 on highway construction they can well afford to wait a couple of years when they will get much more for their money, because materials and labor are extremely high at the present time? It will be an economy if the committee in its wisdom should refuse to extend this gasoline tax for in time it will give them more highway construction for less money, and will release these materials for more needed housing and various other public improvements.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. I agree with the gentleman thoroughly. I believe if they will wait 2 years that $1 then will do what it takes $2 to construct today.

Mr. REES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. REES. I was under the impression that the Federal Government had contributed large sums outside of the gasoline tax for the building of bridges and highways and things of that kind in the District of Columbia.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. The Federal Government built this $15,000,000 Memorial Bridge.

Mr. REES. That was not taken out of gasoline-tax funds, was it?

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. No.

Mr. REES. Is it a fact that the District of Columbia has not had enough revenue from the gasoline tax to build the necessary highways and bridges? I am simply asking for information.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Possibly the gentleman is somewhat confused by the matter of the Federal contribution to highway construction. The District of Columbia participates just as though it were a State organization, participates in the matching of funds proportionately based on the amount of money raised through gasoline and automobile taxes. It has the same relationship as a State in that respect.

Mr. REES. I appreciate that, but I have been under the impression that there has been a considerable amount of highway building, bridge building, and street building financed directly by the Federal Government and not by contribution from funds raised by the gas tax in the District. Am I wrong about that?

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. I believe the chairman of the subcommittee can answer that question if he cares to.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. As has been stated, the Government contributes on the same basis as it does in other States. We have a bridge over here running into Anacostia and we have a bridge into Virginia, for which the Government will pay half the cost. The same is true of the $4,000,000 proposed elevated structure and the Dupont Circle improvement. The Government will pay one-half the cost. Of course, the District has participated, like other States, in PWA authorizations and they have participated in other things that were available just like all other States and subdivisions of those States. There is no difference here from what there is in other States.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. May I request the gentleman to take a little more time to discuss, if he will, the real estate tax in the city of Washington and the District of Columbia as compared with the same tax in other States? I have always been under the impression that the city of Washington here is pretty much of a taxpayers' paradise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. I yield myself two additional minutes.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. As I understand it, the real estate tax that some of us, at least, have to pay is more than 100 percent above what the tax in Washington is. I would like to have the gentleman discuss that.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. For some years I had the same opinion as the gentleman but after looking into the matter I find they have in the District about the same tax as we do because they report their property at full valuation and in my State and in other States they do not hand in their property at full value.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It should be made clear that, first of all, there has been a revaluation of property here and millions of dollars of additional value have been written on the books. Secondly, when we have provided for a 25-cent increase in the present bill over the existing rate of $1.75, that will increase the revenue.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. An assessment of $2 a hundred is not like $5 a hundred that some of us have to pay.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has gone into that whole thing, not only in Washington, but in comparable cities all over the country. He can indicate exactly what that situation is at the moment.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. That is exactly the point I raised when I discussed the tax feature on the floor of the House a moment ago. There has been no increase in the tax rate in the District of Columbia since 1937; there has been no increase in valuation since 1937 until this year; but on the basis of assessed value compared with actual value, according to assessment, the ratio is 70 percent of present value and it shows, when compared with cities with over 500,000 population in all the country, that in the District of Columbia we have the lowest tax bill of any city in the country over 500,000 population, even with this legislation.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to an increase in the gasoline tax in the District for a number of reasons. First and most important is the fact that the increase is not needed. I am reliably informed that even after allowing for a further substantial increase in operating expenses over the 1947 level, which was far above the prewar rate of operating expenditures, the highway department will be able to match its Federal aid allocations and carry out its scheduled program of major capital improvements during the next 2 years. The highway department's own figures further show that from existing tax sources and Federal aid, the District will have nearly double as much money for highway purposes during the next 3 years as was available in the 3 years before the war.

The trouble is, of course, that the highway department wants not only to carry out its ambitious major capital improvement program, but it also wants to spend far more for minor capital improvements and for operating expenses than in 1947, which as I already indicated were far above prewar levels. To be more specific, I understand the department wants to spend about $5,000,000 more for these items alone during the next 3 years than it would spend at the 1947 level of appropriations, and the total appropriated for operating expenses last year was nearly 50 percent above the average amount allocated in the 1939–42 period. On top of all this, the highway department has included in the present program over $1,800,000 for miscellaneous expenditures, none of which had been previously included in the Federal postwar program but were listed after this program was to be completed. If these items are moved back to their original status and if operating costs are increased by, say, another 20 percent over the already high 1947 level, then the highway department will be able to carry out its major capital improvement program without any difficulty.

This seems to be the reasonable course and one which will be in the best interest not only of the highway users but of the public generally in the District. It is generally conceded that any increase in highway transportation costs cannot fail to have adverse effects on the economy as a whole. An increase in the gasoline tax would fall with particular severity on the truckers, the taxicab operators, and similar groups who earn their living through the operation of motor vehicles. But the effect would be felt by all groups. For example, the truckers who are finding it so difficult to operate on a profitable basis would have to pass the increased cost along. This would mean that the price of milk, bread, and all of the other commodities which are carried by motor vehicles on some stage of their journey to market, would have to be advanced to compensate for the higher cost arising from the gasoline tax.

There seems to be a general impression that because the District gasoline tax is only 3 cents per gallon, the receipts from this tax are relatively small and also that the automotive tax burden is low. Nothing could be further from the truth. According to the figures of the Public Roads Administration, the District collected over $4,000,000 from the gasoline tax last year, with the trend strongly upward. This is substantially more than was collected by such States as Wyoming, North Dakota, and New Hampshire which have extensive road mileages to maintain—see tables below.

Now let us examine the per vehicle tax burden in the District. Based on the number of private and commercial vehicles registered in the District last year, as reported by the Public Roads Administration, the collections from the 3-cent gasoline tax plus motor vehicle taxes were equivalent to almost $50 per vehicle. This compares with slightly over $37 for the State of Illinois, $30 for Massachusetts and $44 for New Jersey. Then, of course, we must include the Federal tax of 1½ cents per gallon of gasoline. When this is added, the per vehicle tax burden in the District comes to approximately $66. And this is still not counting in Federal excise taxes on lubricating oil, parts, tires and accessories, not to mention the Federal excise on a new car. So I think you will agree that the motor vehicle owners in the District are already shouldering a tremendous burden of taxation to operate their cars and trucks.

I see no need or justification at this time for increasing this tax load. As I indicated at the beginning, with any reasonable control of operating expenses the Highway Department will be able to remain solvent and carry out its major capital improvement program during the next 3 years within the present framework of taxation. If 2 years from now the need for additional funds is indicated, then the situation can be reviewed in the light of conditions at that time. But I repeat that there is no need for additional funds now. Furthermore, I strongly feel that any additional increase in the gasoline tax at this time would merely be adding to the inflationary spiral and would result in the highway users receiving diminishing value in roads for their tax dollars. We all know how tight the labor and materials situation is today and little relief from this situation is in sight for some time to come, at least. As I see it, this is the major problem facing the Highway Department at the present time, not lack of funds.

So in closing, I strongly recommend that the gasoline tax be allowed to continue at its present rate in the confident belief that, along with other motor vehicle taxes and Federal aid, it will provide ample funds to meet the Highway Department's need during the next 2 years, at least.

District of Columbia: Total street and highway mileage, 990.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORAN].

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Chairman, the joint committee deserves every word of commendation that has been expressed here, because the committee has been most diligent in its studies and in its efforts to compile data which will be of inestimable value to the Congress in the future. I want particularly to congratulate my colleague, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, for his untiring efforts; and even though I cannot agree with the result of his labors it is impossible to forego the privilege of expressing the greatest admiration for his zeal and untiring energy.

I conceive it to be my responsibility to invite your attention to the fact that a study of the District of Columbia's financial condition is an annual event and not something novel or unusual. Your Subcommittee on Appropriations for the District of Columbia each year makes a complete study of District affairs for appropriation purposes and in that connection must of necessity inquire into sources of revenue availability. Any interested individual can get a complete picture of the financial condition and the working functions of this city government by reading those hearings.

Many months ago we knew that the District was going to run into financial difficulty, and we worked with the officials of the District in formulating plans for a complete study of the tax structure. We were constantly advised of the progress being made and we were hopeful for the future. Let us for a moment examine the record.

In May 1945, the report of our committee on the 1946 District appropriation bill stated in part as follows:

If the amount of the budget request for the ensuing fiscal year is indicative of a trend for continually increasing appropriations, it would seem to the committee that a suggestion to the District Commissioners for a thorough analysis of the financial structure and the prospective needs of the District is in order. This should take the form of a more detailed scrutiny of budget requests as presented by the individual deparment heads as well as consideration of locating additional sources of revenue.

In April 1946, in reporting on the 1947 District appropriation bill, our committee said:

The increased cost of government, construction, labor costs, and all other items, makes it necessary to find new sources of revenue or increase existing sources, or curtail services now being performed by government. The committee is informed that studies are now being made in search of new sources as well as of increasing existing sources in the most equitable manner. The Commissioners are to be commended for undertaking such a study and looking to the future needs of the District. They will find encouragement and perhaps some ideas as to sources of new revenue from discussions reported in the hearings.

In May 1945, the Commissioners had appointed a committee of District officials to review the tax structure of the District of Columbia. After this committee made preliminary studies of the subject, and before any final conclusions were reached, the Commissioners felt that it was desirable to secure a cross section of public opinion, and accordingly enlarged the committee by appointing thereon a number of representative citizens.

Thereafter, the full committee gave careful consideration to the sources from which additional revenue might be obtained. They studied almost every conceivable method of taxation. Finally, they selected those methods or programs which they believed would produce the greatest amount of revenue, distributed in the most equitable manner. This was democracy at work on a community problem in a governmental division of our Nation which has no other facility for expressing its opinion.

After that committee made its report, but before any final action was taken thereon, the Commissioners held a public hearing to which were invited all interested individual citizens, as well as representatives of citizen, civic, and trade organizations, who were there given a full opportunity to express their opinions on the tax program. Again the vital principle of democratic action was being employed by the city officials in formulating a just and equitable proposition for submission to Congress.

This was not the final step, however, for in their desire to most explicitly express the opinion of the majority of residents of the District of Columbia who would in the last analysis bear the financial burden of the proposed action, the Commissioners went even further in encouraging a full and complete discussion and expression of public opinion.

There were many discussions over the radio. The Board of Trade devoted full meetings to the discussion of the many proposals. Citizens Associations spend many long and serious evenings in discussion of the vital needs of the community, and the manner in which the taxpayers themselves would bear the increased costs of these improvements. All these steps were taken in order that the entire public and Congress might be fully advised as to the tax program necessary to pay the increased costs of government and services in the District of Columbia.

The plan that was finally decided upon by the District Commissioners was, as much as it could be under the voteless form of government District residents must suffer, the plan most representative of the desires and wishes of the people who would pay the bills.

The plan finally came to the Congress, the bills were drawn and cleared through the Bureau of the Budget. The hearings started. Many days, many witnesses, much, much costs were added because of the extended post-investigation. And now the long-awaited report of the Fiscal Committee at long last is completed.

The result? Well, the city once again is shocked with a feeling of impotency as it observes their own long-studied and long-debated plan almost totally discarded. The Commissioners, with their back against the wall and with the end of the fiscal year only a few days off, can hardly do anything but agree to almost any plan that will mean more revenue.

Well, I cannot agree. I plead with you for a recognition of your responsibility toward the residents of the District of Columbia, those voteless thousands whom we tax and whose money we appropriate.

Just because we have the power is all the more reason why we should not exercise it arbitrarily. Certainly, you all know that the sovereign power is lodged in the United States and the Congress possesses full and complete jurisdiction both of a municipal and Federal nature over the District of Columbia.

Do not let us fool these residents who gave earnest consideration to this tax program. If you do, then please forego all pious expressions of interest in their welfare, which lead them to the belief that they will someday have some semblance of home rule. It is my firm opinion that when the citizens of this community, through their own officials and through their citizens associations and civic organizations, have presented to Congress a tax program which would in their opinion be adequate to finance the cost of local government and provide essential services—that that program should be given first consideration.

These citizens have by an overwhelming majority expressed their desire for a sales tax, the one tax that spreads the cost to all those who derive the benefits; they have demanded overwhelmingly an increased alcoholic beverage tax; they have approved a gasoline tax; and they want a more equitable income tax. The present recommendations of the fiscal committee do not by any stretch of the imagination reflect this community's opinion. The taxpayers are not in favor of an increased real-estate tax. In fact, under the existing law the Commissioners have authority to raise the real-estate tax rate without coming up to the Congress; the income tax proposed is still not corrective of the inequities which exist in the present law; and the increased Federal contribution recommended is apparently based upon nothing but—whim.

Why was the alcoholic beverage tax spurned, and the sales tax ignored? It strikes me that the political expediency of far distant areas of our Nation is clearly and biasly written into the proposals emerging from the fiscal committee. Are we going to play politics with the people of this city in the belief that they cannot come back at us through the power of the ballot box? I am taking my stand with the people and asking the Congress for a square deal.

All too frequently in the past Congress has increased the costs of the District of Columbia without making any provision for increasing its income. In the last Congress $1,950,000 were included in the appropriation bill for which there were no budget estimates.

That, you may say, was the responsibility of the Appropriation Committee. However, I invite your attention to the Hospital Center program, authorizing an appropriation of $35,000,000 with a 30 percent charge against the revenues of the District of Columbia. I invite your attention to the slum clearance bill, the District Redevelopment Act wherein it is provided that at the end of 10 years any deficit will be shared equally by the Federal Government and the District.

I invite your attention to the recent appropriation of $400,000 for plans for a new court building which undoubtedly will cost the District taxpayers many millions of dollars.

I invite your attention to all of the salary acts affecting the teachers, firemen, policemen, per diem and civil-service employees of the District government, which run into millions of dollars in additional compensation annually. I invite your attention to the increased cost of maintenance and operation in every form of municipal endeavor, and frankly tell you that we do not know what we are going to do to maintain the standard of service that is required for this great capital city. We need millions and millions of dollars and this program will not be adequate to fulfill those needs.

I personally am very much disturbed over the school situation in the District of Columbia. Think of 7,000 pupils going to school on a part-time basis in the Nation's Capital. This condition must be rectified and it must be rectified now. It cannot be done, however, if we are to be limited by the program presented to you by the Fiscal Committee.

Those 7,000 pupils in the Nation's Capital City will continue to receive a second-rate education until such time as this Congress accepts its responsibility and provides adequate facilities for them. We have a dozen or so bills pending in this Congress, asking for Federal aid to the school systems across the Nation. There is an ironic sort of humor in this, when we consider that, in the one place where our Federal Government has full responsibility for education—the schools are poorly equipped, overcrowded, and crumbling on their foundations. Heaven help the 48 States if Federal aid means placing the Nation's schools on a par with those in the District of Columbia. And yet we are being asked further to postpone the urgent plans for providing at least a minimum of educational facilities for this Capital City.

Mr. Chairman, there is a little secret among us that what opposition there is to a sales tax comes—not from a due regard for the desires of the residents of the District of Columbia—but from a fear of the effect upon situations back in the home districts of certain Members of this body.

Indeed, one of the Members only last week told me: "I cannot vote for a sales tax here; it would be political suicide back home." That gentleman happens to come from a State which has no sales tax and in which pressure groups probably have convinced him that a sales tax would be unpopular with the people.

Well, they said the same thing out in Washington, some 10 years ago, when our legislature adopted the sales tax. I have yet to hear of one political death which came as a result. In fact, the vast bulk of the people have long since realized that it was a far better solution to their fiscal problems than would have been gained from further increases in real estate taxes or imposition of a second income tax.

There is no place in the country today where a sales tax is more in order than in the District of Columbia. This is the one place where an income tax is hardest of all to enforce—and that fact is one that still is being unrealistically dodged in the present attempt to spread its application. A further increase in property taxes can result only in increased monopoly in real estate holding—making it virtually impossible for a man to own his own home. And every one of us here realizes full well that the stability of this Nation is founded upon its home owners.

There is only one way in which we can force the great bulk of transient and temporary resident population here to pay its share of the District's expense load—and that is by collecting a tax on the transactions entered into by all of those people who take advantage of the facilities here provided for them.

That, as I see it, is the only fair way. It is the only way we can collect from the leeches who have been riding free for years. It is the only way we can lessen the burden on the honest few who have carried the load these many years. It must be adopted if the needs of the District are to be recognized.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORAN. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SPRINGER. Under this plan which the gentleman is proposing are purchases of clothing and essential food items excluded?

Mr. HORAN. No; the original act did have exemptions, but we are going to introduce that act with amendments of our own excluding those items, because where you have exemptions and discriminations you greatly impair the act, raise the cost of administration, and encourage abuses.

Mr. SPRINGER. In other words, the proposal is going to be all-inclusive?

Mr. HORAN. That is right. I think it would have to be.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I was interested in the statement the gentleman made concerning the 7,000 school children who are going to school part time.

Mr. HORAN. That is right. There are 20 schools now operating part-time classes.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. What is the excuse of the school administration for accepting over 3,200 students from outside the District of Columbia?

Mr. HORAN. We have discussed that with Dr. Corning and Dr. Wilkinson, of the school administration, and they feel that the District really has an additional cost, that is, they are losing about $412,000 a year because of out-of-District people taking advantage of the schools here. However, if they exclude those people they will not gain $412,000, since those students are spread throughout the entire school system, and hence there would not be any great chances to close schools.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Well, a saving of $412,000 surely would be worth while, would it not?

Mr. HORAN. It would not result in a saving. We have asked them to tighten up on what is a clear invasion of a privilege.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. How many teachers would it take for 3,200 people?

Mr. HORAN. Outside children are allowed to come in and use the District institutions under certain circumstances. It is understood that a large proportion of those who are coming into the District and raising our expenses was allowed by specific acts of Congress, which specifically allowed them to do it. In answer to the gentleman's question, as I have said, they are spread throughout the entire system—a student here and another there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORAN] has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORAN. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. I would like the gentleman to make this clear to the House. First, real-estate assessments are made in the District every year. There is the opportunity of revaluing every year; but the practice has been, as was testified by the Assessor before your committee and my committee, that the Assessor does not do that; he does not accept the new market valuations. He has a rule of assessing property over a 10-year period or longer; what it might be worth over the average time, when he has an opportunity to revalue it every year.

Mr. HORAN. That is correct. Of course, the real-estate tax is a difficult thing to handle on account of the way the District is limited by the Constitution. Parts of the District of Columbia that were originally in Virginia have been removed and since that time the Federal Government has increased its holdings until today of the approximately 70 square miles area only about 49 percent of it is subject to taxation. So you have an expanding city, moving out into the suburbs, but with taxable land stopping at Western and Eastern Avenues. Manifestly, if you are going to have an increase in the metropolitan area that cannot be taxed for the purpose of running the government here, a sales tax is the only way you can get at those people who use the District.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORAN. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. As I understand, the gentleman is going to propose an amendment, or is it in the nature of a substitute, for a sales tax?

Mr. HORAN. The amendment I will offer will be a new article. It will be based upon the Dirksen bill that was offered by the chairman of the committee. We are amending that, however, to exclude exemptions, and we are making some other changes that I will explain later.

Mr. HARRIS. Would that be additional revenue to what this bill proposes?

Mr. HORAN. Yes; we believe it is very difficult to evaluate the amount that will be collected by a sales tax.

Mr. HARRIS. How much revenue does the gentleman think could be derived from a sales tax such as he will propose?

Mr. HORAN. I believe the estimates are $15,000,000 for the second year. The first year it will be about $11,000,000.

Mr. HARRIS. A 2-percent sales tax?

Mr. HORAN. Yes; it has to be limited by the adjoining States. Maryland has a 2-percent sales tax.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield the gentleman two additional minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORAN. I yield.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman claim that by a suggested sales tax that will yield $15,000,000 and eliminate all other taxes, that the real-estate tax today is what might be called a fair tax in the District of Columbia?

Mr. HORAN. I think it would be.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. And compared with what the taxpayers pay in their own communities and in their own States?

Mr. HORAN. I think it would be.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman had better look at the figures.

Mr. HORAN. The reason why we have to be careful about property tax is that the area is limited. It puts an added burden on the owners of property.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Do you not think the owners of real estate here ought to assume some share of the increased cost of government, which they have not assumed since 1937?

Mr. HORAN. I think they should. Manifestly, they cannot assume it all.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. No, and they are not asked to under this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, we are discussing here today a most unusual problem. I think it is most interesting in that we have seen our good friends whom I love and admire over on our left who have been advocating tax reduction, reduced expenditures, and so forth ever since last November bring us now a proposal to increase taxes.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HORAN. I wish to make it plain that this is not a Federal tax, this is a tax for the local government, raising revenues to balance the budget of an area that can be called both a municipality and a State. Since, of course, only the Federal Government can coin or issue money it becomes incumbent upon us—I know the gentleman from Arkansas agrees—if we are going to make sure that the Federal budget is balanced to do everything we can to take burdens off of the Federal Government and let the municipalities and States shoulder the burdens they should shoulder.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, I recognize the fact that the gentleman cannot forget that the majority proposes to increase the Federal contribution here out of the Public Treasury in the sum of $4,000,000. I am calling the attention of the House to the fact, that is most amazing and amusing, that after having gone through a 5 months' session hollering about reduction of expenditures, hollering about the reduction of taxes, now we are faced in this Congress with a bill that proposes to increase taxes.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield.

Mr. HORAN. If you adopt a sales tax there will be no need to increase the Federal contribution.

Mr. HARRIS. The gentleman knows, of course, that taxes are taxes; it does not make any difference what kind is imposed. If it is a sales tax the people are going to have to pay just like they will have to pay any other increase of revenue.

Mr. Chairman, I am not one of those who feel that we should shirk any responsibility that is ours in connection with the fiscal affairs of the District of Columbia. I recognize the fact that the revenue laws of the District need some readjustment. We must recognize the fact that there is a responsibility to the Nation's Capital that we must meet.

One thing of which I am a little apprehensive in connection with any of the fiscal affairs of the District is the tendency first to run to the Federal Treasury. I suppose that no one individual or group here in the District can be criticized. We talk about increasing the school allotment, providing more welfare funds, providing for increased highways, capital outlay. The first thing, "Let's go to the Federal Treasury."

The proposal under consideration today is not without its controversial features and I wish to discuss it frankly with you. I think every Member of Congress should understand what it is, know what he is doing before he votes. This is a proposal to increase the revenues of the District of Columbia to take care of the added expenditures of the operation of the government of the District of Columbia and the extra capital outlay in both major and minor construction. I want to call your attention to the fact that this proposes to increase the revenues to meet the budget by $10,400,000. Is that right?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. That is exactly right, $10,494,000.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the plan to raise this money? In the first place, as you have been told, the real-estate tax is being increased from $1.75 to $2. That within itself, it is estimated, will increase the revenues of the District by $4,500,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I think that explains itself. We all know, as everyone in the District knows, what an increase of 25 cents a hundred would mean on real estate.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. But after you increase it from $1.75 to $2, as I understand it, you are still not halfway to what we in the States are paying. Would it not be the fair thing here in the city of Washington, where property is so valuable and so high, where renting has always been good, where the revenues will always be fine, to make the real-estate owners pay a part of this increase and more than two bits?

Mr. HARRIS. May I say to the gentleman that the real-estate people will pay an increase of four and a half million dollars in the revenue yield totaling ten and a half million dollars approximately to be raised.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. But they are paying almost nothing now. They are not paying half as much now as we are paying in the States. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the record over there, and I know the gentleman is familiar with it. Would it not be fair to let the District of Columbia pay at least what the average big city in the Nation pays?

Mr. HARRIS. The tax in the District of Columbia is $1.75 now. This will make it $2 a hundred on a supposed 100-percent valuation.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. According to the Assessor's records, even on the revaluation, it is only 70 percent and on residential property it is only 62 percent. That is what the Assessor has handed to me and what he has testified before the committee. On revaluation even, those are the figures.

Mr. HARRIS. What is it supposed to be?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Of course, the law says and the gentleman from Illinois suggests 100 percent, and I go along with that. I think the assessed valuation is high enough.

Mr. HARRIS. If the gentleman will permit, I explained the difference in the law insofar as the District of Columbia is concerned and various other States. Different States have different assessment valuations. Some States have a 50-percent valuation, some 100 percent. It varies from one State to another. For instance, in my State I believe it is $4.80 a hundred on a 50-percent valuation. In the District of Columbia it is $1.75 on a 100-percent valuation.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. We in our State are assessed on a 100-percent valuation and we pay $5 a hundred.

Mr. HARRIS. I agree with the gentleman that the real estate in the District of Columbia should bear its fair and proportionate part of the responsibility and cost of operation of the government.

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. O'HARA. The gentleman realizes that the Commissioners have raised the assessment 20 percent, whether this bill becomes law or not. So the people in the District of Columbia will be paying, as I am informed, about a 31-percent increase in real-estate assessments. I think the gentleman will agree with me that we cannot make a rule simply because the real-estate tax is as high as it is in the gentleman's State or my State or the State of the gentleman from Louisiana. That does not necessarily fix the fair share of the burden of real estate in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS. I think it is fair to state that the real-estate tax in the District of Columbia is in the very low brackets compared with other States throughout the Nation.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The adjusted rate—that is, applying the assessed value to the full value and then getting the adjusted tax rate—in every city of over 500,000 population averages $18.81, and the adjusted rate here is $11.64, and that does not include the so-called town, city, or school taxes in the other cities, so it is much lower here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. HARRIS. There are two other things particularly in this bill that this House ought to become familiar with: One is the income tax to be proposed and the other is the increase in the gas tax.

Now, since my State has an income-tax law, what I am going to say will not necessarily apply. The proposed bill would exempt anyone who has a regular domicile or residence and pays his income tax back in his home State from having to pay in the District of Columbia. This bill provides that where you do not have a residence or domicile status in your own State, and you reside in or are domiciled in the District of Columbia as much as 7 months out of the year or are here on the last day of the taxable year, you then become subject to income tax. Is that not right?

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, does he mean coming from an income-tax-paying State?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. No; he is not subject to the payment of the tax for the simple reason that he makes a certification that he has paid his income tax in his own State, which would be higher than the amount he would pay in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS. That is just what I said.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. HARRIS. But you have some States where you do not have an income-tax law. The State of Pennsylvania is one and I believe the State of Texas is another. I thnk there are 16.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. They have intangible personal-property taxes, and if they pay them, they again would be exempt.

Mr. HARRIS. But the gentleman cannot very well say that a person in the District of Columbia is going to be exempt from the payment of income tax in the State of Pennsylvania because he happens to pay a little intangible property tax there.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Intangible personal-property tax.

Mr. HARRIS. All right. Here is what it will do. It will say to that person who pays no income tax back home, or if he wants to pay an intangible tax, that regardless of where your residence is, where you live, because the State of Texas or the State of Pennsylvania or the other 14 States do not have the income tax, because you stay 7 months in the District of Columbia or live here on the last day of the taxable year, you have got to pay income tax in the District of Columbia.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. ABERNETHY. You do not have to stay here 7 months, you just keep an apartment here 7 months and you will have to pay it.

Mr. HARRIS. You have to be domiciled here.

Mr. ABERNETHY. It may be just a place of abode. You do not have to stay in it, you just keep it.

Mr. HARRIS. I am talking now of what I believe to be a basic policy. In other words, you say to the people in the States that have an income tax that if you have a man representing you in Washington in some capacity except an elective office, and he is required to spend a certain amount of his time here each year, he pays his income tax back home and is exempt from paying here in the District of Columbia, but if he does not have an income tax in that State he is not subjected to the tax laws of that State but must pay here in the District of Columbia. I say that is a discrimination insofar as the rights of the States are concerned. I do not know when my State might want to repeal its income-tax provisions, not any time soon, I think, but there is a basic policy involved here. Are you going to treat persons from one State differently from those from another State?

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. VURSELL. I have a question that I think may be of interest to other Members of Congress. I have two secretaries here who do not pay any real estate tax or any taxes of any kind in my own county, but they do pay a rather heavy Federal income tax. As I understand, if this bill passes, in addition to the Federal income tax they will pay a District income tax by virtue of being employed here practically 7 months a year.

Mr. HARRIS. The Federal income tax has nothing at all to do with it. They will be required to pay the income tax here in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Chairman, I wanted to say something about the proposed increase in the gas tax here but I shall refrain from that until later when we read the bill for amendment.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, on last Thursday the Committee on the District of Columbia met to consider the tax question for the coming fiscal year. At that time the committee did not even have before it a printed copy of the bill. The bill, as you will see by looking at it, is 88 pages over-all.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not know whether I understood the gentleman correctly. We had a meeting on Wednesday, at which time we had a copy of the bill but not in printed form. On Thursday, the following morning, the bill was available to all the members when we had the final session.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. The morning I attended I believe was Thursday morning. Is that right.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. That is right.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. The bill was not available to me at that time.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. It was Friday when we had the full meeting, but we had a reprint of the original bill containing precisely the same language that was considered about 4 days before.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. When was the bill I hold in my hand printed and made available to the committee members?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Last Friday morning, before we had the meeting, but precisely the same language, with very minor exceptions, was in the bill of about 4 days before.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. That is what I stated at the outset, that I received this bill when I came to the committee meeting Friday morning. I had not seen the bill to which the gentleman has just referred as being almost identical in language, which was discarded, and this bill here printed. I understand the gentleman to say now that that bill was available 4 days earlier than this bill?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. We had a separate income-tax bill, as the gentleman recalls. We combined them into this omnibus bill. The original income-tax bill was precisely the same, with one minor change suggested by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] that was incorporated in the new bill. That is about the only real change.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. Was not another substantial change made with reference to the gasoline tax, placing a limitation of 5 years on it?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The gentleman is speaking about the income tax itself.

Mr. HARRIS. He is speaking about the entire bill.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I am speaking about the entire bill.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The other bill, relating to the gasoline tax, had been printed for 4 days before that time, and it is precisely the same bill as we have on the calendar today in this omnibus bill, except that instead of its being a continuing tax of 4 cents, we make it 3 cents, with the additional cent to continue until after 1952. That is the only change.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I do not dispute with the gentleman as to when the income tax or the gasoline tax bill was printed, but the committee had not had under consideration the bill now before us or the tax items that are in this bill so far as I know or so far as any session of the committee is concerned which I attended.

I join with those who have expressed, and I wish now to express, great appreciation to the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES], as well as joining with all those who have paid tribute to his remarkable ability in handling matters of this kind. He has stated that in the short time this bill was under discussion by the whole committee that he and his subcommittee had spent many weeks in considering these items. I have no doubt but what they did spend many weeks considering them. However, this is an 88-page bill and involves money amounting to almost $100,000,000. However much the gentleman and his subcommittee may have studied it, I do not think it is sound to enact legislation involving as much money as this bill does, as long as this bill is, on the basis of what somebody else knows about it. I, myself, would like to know about these matters, and up to this time I have not had an opportunity to make investigations that I would like to make.

For that reason, I believe this bill should go back for further study.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, since we have been discussing the mechanics of this bill, I am afraid that we are losing sight of the objectives of these taxes.

We must keep in mind that during 1937 the taxable income to the District was $42,759,132. In 1948, more than 10 years later, the increased demands for revenue have gone to $97,000,000, that is, an increase of $54,000,000.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Those are the expenditures for 1937?

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Yes, those were the expenditures of 1937, and the anticipated expenditures of 1948, which reflect an increase of $54,000,000.

We have 2 alternatives. Either we go to the Treasury and make a raid on it for the appropriations necessary to manage the functions of government of the District or we raise additional taxes. At the beginning of the session of Congress our most able chairman undertook the study of the financial structure and fiscal policy of the District of Columbia and through these long months he has spent much time and hard labor in perfecting a sound tax program.

Of course, it is unfortunate that taxes must be raised, but there are new demands that must be met. I recognize the fact that it might work some hardship on the income-tax proposal but I hope the Congress will not look upon the exceptions to make the rule, and that is those people who do not pay an income tax in their respective States. Even with this additional tax revenue that will be raised in the District of Columbia, it will be less than any other city of its size in the United States except one, I believe.

So I hope the House will accept these tax provisions. Even though before the committee I was not impressed with the tax on gasoline, I had to take it in connection with the over-all tax program. So there was a limitation placed in the gasoline tax provision that limited it to the fiscal year 1952.

The construction program, schools, street improvements, and all the various functions of government in the District of Columbia need help and need immediate help. As I stated a minute ago, there is no pleasant way of imposing taxes on any people, but at the same time they have the responsibility of their government in the District of Columbia.

I hope you will accept the committee's recommendations and approve the tax program that has been promulgated and presented to you today.

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. DEANE. I appreciate very much the statement of the gentleman from Alabama. I would like to ask concerning the gasoline tax. Is it understood that at the expiration of this period, which is 1952, the gas tax will be stabilized?

Mr. JONES of Alabama. No. In 1952 the 1 cent additional tax imposed between now and that time would be in effect. After 1952 it would require additional legislation to maintain the 1 cent additional tax.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. It goes back to the 3 cents which we now have.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. It will revert to the present tax schedule.

Mr. DEANE. One question occurs to me at this time, as to whether or not we might, with justification, secure some additional revenue from this large number of students who are coming into the District from the outside, and who are now coming to the various schools without cost.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. I do not know how you could impose any additional tax, because you would have to impose one type of tax on a nonresident and another type on a resident. I do not see how you could contemplate that.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Of course, by statute the Congress a few years ago authorized the school department to accept pupils from adjoining States without cost if their parents worked for the Government. They have increased the number from 2,200 to 3,300 as of today, and it is now costing the District and the taxpayers nearly half a million dollars to take care of those children.

Mr. DEANE. Does not the chairman feel some remedy should be made of that situation?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I feel the law ought to be repealed, in fairness to the taxpayers of the District, but that is not embraced in this tax bill.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Let me tell you my own experience in that regard. Immediately after I came to Washington I sent my son to the Kimball School out in the section where I live. He went to school 3 hours a day because they do not have sufficient accommodations for the enrollment. They take half the group at one time and half at another. So we have had not only an increase in population but we have a population shifting within the city.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. McMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of the time on this side, together with that yielded by the gentleman from South Carolina, to myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, the expiration of this time will conclude the general debate.

I deem it scarcely necessary to add anything to the excellent summary made by my good friend, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JONES]. I think he has stated the case very aptly and very succinctly. There are perhaps one or two items we might have changed, it is true, but we are dealing with the 1948 District budget. The Legislative Committee of the District of Columbia has no control over it. It is handed to us. So on that basis there is an ascertained deficit of $10,500,000. The question therefore is how to find $10,500,000. That is the question that was asked the subcommittee under the leadership of Mr. BATES. I may say in that connection that the subcommittee had a special adviser by the name of Parker L. Jackson, from Massachusetts. He is regarded as a national authority on municipal finance. He is the adviser to the Governor of Massachusetts on municipal finances. He is the adviser to large financial interests who buy municipal bonds. So the committee was amply implemented, I believe, by expert advice.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield briefly.

Mr. HORAN. In connection with the budget, we are not too sure that on the basis of need and unavoidance we may not have more than a $10,500,000 deficit. It is very serious.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But the statement stands that the legislative committee of the District of Columbia has no choice except to deal with the 1948 budget. So the question then is, Where do we get $10,500,000? Where do we get the deficit? Obviously, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JONES] just said, unless we raid the Federal Treasury it must come in the form of taxes. There are a variety of taxes, they are legion, that could be suggested. The Commissioners themselves submitted nine, and the subcommittee explored many under the chairmanship of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES], and the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN]. Finally they submitted a proposal to change the rate of the real-estate tax. It is $1.75 now. It is proposed to raise it to $2. It is expected that this will raise substantially $4,000,000. The Commissioners under existing law have the power to increase the real-estate rate, but they do it only in an emergency; so we have to direct them to do it. From this source we will get an additional $4,000,000. We are not going beyond the limit of the formula that is often applied in most of the States. About 65 percent of all the general revenues in the States, in some cases 80 percent, comes from real estate. At the present time real estate in the District supplies about 45 percent of the tax revenue; so the tax increase on real estate is fairly justified.

A second item is the income tax. In addition to the revenues we get now it is hoped this will raise somewhere in excess of $3,000,000 additional taxes. We do not change the rate that exists here, and that has been in existence since 1939. The crux of this proposition is the question of residence and domicile. May a person live in Washington or some other jurisdiction for 7 months in the year, enjoy all the benefits of a splendid sanitary system, enjoy the benefits of police protection, enjoy the benefits of protection by the Fire Department, enjoy the parks, and all the other benefits of a public nature, the stop-and-go signs that protect against hazards on the street corners——

Mr. HORAN rose.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I cannot yield now.

Mr. HORAN. I merely wished to make the suggestion that we have that same privilege.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am not quarreling about that.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Not now, please.

May a person enjoy those benefits and escape paying any share of their cost?

A great deal of study has been given to this subject. We have had 308 domicile cases and we have had thousands come before the Assessor. We are trying to work this thing out so that it is not on a voluntary basis that people pay, depending on whether or not they want to. This question arose in Maryland in 1942. The Court of Appeals of Maryland ruled on it. I think the decision is very interesting. They said that a person having an intention to return to his domicile outside the State of Maryland at some indefinite period but living in Maryland at the time for a purpose not regarded as transient cannot be regarded as a sojourn by the taxpayer so as to destroy resident status. This man came from New York and had lived in Maryland since 1939, had a splendid Federal job. He claimed he was not domiciled in the State, but the Court of Appeals said, "You are here for a sufficiently specific purpose so that you get all the benefits and protection of an orderly social existence; so you are expected to pay your share." What is wrong with that? That is what we are trying to do in this bill in clarifying this question of domicile and residence. That is the whole story in a nutshell.

First, there is this question of the real-estate tax; secondly, clarifying in existing law this question of domicile without raising the rate. What is the rate? It is 1 percent on the first $5,000 of taxable income. What are the exemptions? One thousand dollars for an individual, $2,000 for a family. If the gross income is $5,000 for a man and wife, the exemption is $2,000, so there is left $3,000 of taxable net income. What is the rate? In that particular case his tax would not be over $30 a year. It is the lowest tax anywhere.

In the 32 jurisdictions that have an income tax, they are all higher and the people coming from there do not pay because there is an offset. In the other 16 they do not pay that at home and if they are domiciled here or if they are resident here for 7 months, if they enjoy all of the benefits of the District, including the parks, the Police Department, and everything else, why should they not contribute something to the Nation's Capital? Is that asking too much? Certainly not. That is the only question that is really involved here.

The other item in this revenue program is the lump sum. Did you know that for 89 years starting with 1790 the Federal Government paid a sum equal to 38 percent of all the District general revenue? Then for a period of 42 years from 1879 on we paid 50 percent of the whole cost of the District of Columbia. Then for 4 years it was 40 percent. Then it went on a lump-sum basis. Mind you in all that time it was from 40 percent on up, all those years. How much is it in 1947? It is 8.6 percent. That is all we pay. So we felt it ought to be increased.

Why should it be increased? I will tell you why. There are 5,000 mentals over in St. Elizabeths Hospital—and this answers the gentleman from Arkansas—that are charged to Washington. The rate was $2.55 per day, as you will recall, but this has been increased to $3.20 per day. You may correct me if I am wrong. It is now costing us $2,200,000 more. Last year we had a pay-roll increase for Federal employees. We increased the rate, so we had to increase that for the District of Columbia. That cost $5,000,000. We increased the rate for the per diem employees. That legislation came out of the Civil Service Committee. It applied to the Government generally. So we had to raise the per diem employees in the District of Columbia. That cost $724,000.

Now you can understand why the District budget has gone up from $42,000,000 to $95,000,000. It is because of general legislation applying to the whole country that is in the very nature of things made applicable to the District of Columbia. How are you going to help yourselves?

The Congress is responsible. Under these circumstances is it not fair to contribute something more than 8½ percent out of the Federal Treasury?

Now, that $4,000,000 increase is divided as follows: Three million dollars goes to general revenue, and $1,000,000 goes to the water fund. Maybe you do not know it but since time immemorial the Federal Government has been getting its water free of charge from the District of Columbia—$850,000 worth of water every year, for which Uncle Sam has not paid a nickel.

Mr. Chairman, in the name of all good conscience we have to be fair. These people cannot help themselves. They came to us on bended knee and said: "Put a tax on us, but see that it is reasonable and equitable. We will take a real-estate tax increase if you will increase the lump sum a little bit." We made that deal with them and today this program has the approval of the Commissioners, it has been approved by the budget officer, it has been approved by the subcommittee of the Senate and the subcommittee of the House, it has been approved by the Committee on the District of Columbia by a vote of 15 to 2. In the name of conscience, what more can we do in order to bring in here a sound, stable fiscal program to meet the deficit in the 1948 budget that has been laid in our lap?

Mr. Chairman, I hope all Members will support this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. All time has expired.

The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act, divided into articles, may be cited as the "District of Columbia Revenue Act of 1947," and that article I of this act may be cited as the "District of Columbia Income and Franchise Tax Act of 1947."

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, in the nature of an inquiry, I would like to know whether or not we could consider the bill as read, because it is a long bill, and then let any portion of the bill be subject to amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, if it is agreeable with the members of the committee, that the bill be considered as read, and that it be open to amendment at any place?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I think this is a good opportunity for the Members of the House who will be here on the floor to observe the reading of what a revenue bill is for the District of Columbia. Aside from the fact that this bill completely revises the revenue laws of the District of Columbia, and because it was introduced as an omnibus bill only last Thursday, I believe that the Members of this House should have the opportunity of having it read by the Clerk; not that I want to unnecessarily delay the committee and the business of the House today, but I do feel that this is rather important, and I do not think that we should hurriedly pass this without considering the effect of the legislation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, let me amend my request. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be read by title, in other words, we get continuity for each title of the bill, which would mean that the entire income-tax provision would be read without interruption, and then the bill be open to amendment at any point thereof.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not believe we could expedite the consideration of this bill by doing that, and I believe it should be read.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, the fact is that we do not have a quorum on the floor at the present time, and what is the use of reading the entire bill?

Mr. HARRIS. Has the gentleman read the bill?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I have read a portion of it; yes.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the gentleman really know what the bill contains?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I think I know what the average Member of the House knows about it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I withdraw my request, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1. Repeal of prior Income Tax Act: The District of Columbia Income Tax Act as approved and enacted July 26, 1939, and as amended, is hereby repealed with respect to taxable years or portions thereof beginning on and after the 1st day of January 1947 for all purposes, except the following purposes in connection with taxes due or accrued under said District of Columbia Income Tax Act:

(a) For the imposition of assessments and penalties, civil and criminal, for the violation of or failure to comply with any provisions of such act and the regulations prescribed thereunder;

(b) For requiring the making, filing, and submission of returns and reports required by such act;

(c) For the examination of all books, records, and other documents, and witnesses;

(d) For the assessment and collection of the taxes imposed by such act, and the filing of liens therefor; and

(e) For the allowance of refunds of overpayments of any taxes assessed under the provisions of such act.

SEC. 2. Applicability of article: The provisions of this article shall apply to the taxable year or part thereof beginning on the 1st day of January 1947 and to succeeding taxable years.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I did not finish all that I wanted to say a few moments ago about this bill, and I would like to ask the Chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, a question at this point. I notice that in the report the figures are given as expenditures under the budget requirement for this year as $83,000,000 and some odd hundred thousand, and during the one session at which we discussed this bill in the whole committee, on some notes which I made growing out of the discussion—and the gentleman from Massachusetts gave more information than any one else—I think that these figures were given by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I have here a note that the budget for the ensuing year is $95,082,000. Did the gentleman give those figures at the committee meeting?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The administration set-up in the District is, first, the general fund, into which flow general revenues to meet the obligations of the general departments, including schools. Then we have a highway fund, that is supported entirely from gasoline revenues and registration fees. We also have a water department, which is carried on separately on the revenue from water rates. Lumping the three of them together the estimated expenditures this year are $97,457,500.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. That is the sum of $95,082,000 plus the increase in the teachers' salaries, $2,500,000?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. That is exactly right, because the teachers' salary increase was not carried in the budget the Commission submitted to the subcommittee this year.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Those are the figures I have. In the committee report, which was only printed on June 6, according to its first page, I saw the figures $83,000,000-odd as being the budget for this year.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. There is $71,000,000 in the general fund for 1948, the highway fund is $9,200,000, and the water fund is $8,600,000.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. In the discussion before the full committee the gentleman referred to the fact also that the Dupont Circle underpass could not be completed until the year 1950, that is, the construction of it would not even be begun, as I remember now, until 1950. Is that correct?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. That is correct. If this 1-cent increase in the gas tax is not approved, the Dupont Circle construction cannot start at all. If it is increased to yield $1,600,000 next year and in 1949, the Dupont Circle project—that is the major project—can start in 1949.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Regardless of the increase in the bill we are now considering, they cannot start now under existing circumstances?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Neither can the additional bridge to Virginia start. Both those projects must go out the window.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Until 1950?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. They go out altogether if we do not increase the tax.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. If the 1-cent tax is passed, when will the construction be begun?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. In the Dupont Circle job the first allocation of funds is the first quarter of 1950, if we approve this 1-cent gasoline tax.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There are some funds available.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The funds the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] is referring to are minor expenditures for what we call underground work, but the major part cannot start until 1950 unless this tax increase is approved.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. When is it contemplated that the bridge to Virginia can be started?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The cost of both those bridges is $9,000,000. One of them is going to start presently, because the contract is being entered into. They tell me that the other bridge cannot be started until after 1950.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Regardless of whether or not the 1 cent is added now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to continue for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I ask the gentleman what relation, if any, there is between the steel structural work on the South Capitol bridge and the bill?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The foundation for the South Capitol Street bridge is already in. They have readvertised for bids for the superstructure. The bids were excessive so they did not accept them. They do intend to readvertise them around September. But again may I say that if we do not get this 1-cent gas tax it is very probable that the South Capitol Street bridge will go out the window, and also the Dupont Circle job.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. Do I understand our friend the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that we are going to suffer the obstruction of the streets and the street being torn up at Dupont Circle for 3 more years until 1950 before any major work is begun on it when they have already torn it up?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I do not know what the administration problem is, Mr. Chairman, but I do say that the underground work is presently going on and will be completed with available funds. Then, I understand the hole can be covered up temporarily with pavement, and then in 1950 they can start on the actual construction work on the major project.

Mr. DIRKSEN. May I say there will be about $423,000 worth of relocation work under way right along?

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as my time has been consumed by the Members, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the facts which have been discussed here indicate to me that this important subject ought to be carefully and thoroughly considered. The matters we are discussing here are matters that I as a member of the District Committee have not had an opportunity to discuss and investigate as thoroughly as I think they should be investigated and discussed.

I recall at one meeting of the joint subcommittee of the Senate and House District Committees when some of the citizens in the Dupont Circle area were complaining and asking that this project be postponed or not entered into that a Mr. Winchester, who, I believe, is the proper official of the District to discuss this matter and give facts concerning it, said as an inducement to the joint subcommittee to provide for and continue with this work that the District had the money with which to do the job. At the meeting last Thursday, the gentleman from Massachusetts told us that the District does not have the money to do the job and repeats his assertion today.

This business of going into a serious question like this of raising taxes without knowing exactly what we are going to do and how far it will go is something that we should not indulge in. We ought to know exactly what is what, and when a member of the District government appears before a joint subcommittee, he ought to be able to give accurate information, information that will be as good today as it was 4 weeks ago when it was given.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. That information was given to the subcommittee of which the gentleman himself is a member, and not our subcommittee. Is that correct?

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. That is correct. It was the joint committee of the Senate and House District Committees.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. In the examination of the expenditure sheets I observed that it did not provide for any expenditure until 1950 for the major job of Dupont Circle, and the head of the Highway Department admits that to be so.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. The point is that the joint subcommittee was given information on which we had a right to rely and which ought to be accurate, and in passing on these things we ought to take time to carefully consider them.

If I could investigate this I might be like the gentleman from Massachusetts and think this is the right bill to pass, but I do not know that now. I think the Declaration of Independence is a wonderful document, but I would not be inclined to pass it if it had been printed for the first time on Friday and put up for a vote on Monday. More time than that should be devoted to important legislation, and these discrepancies and inaccuracies indicate to me that we ought to take time enough to thresh this out and not undertake to rush it through like this when the Members of the House as well as the members of the committee do not know what the facts are.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. Returns under prior income tax act and returns for first taxable year to which this article is applicable: If the taxable year of any person ends on the last day of any month other than December prior to the 1st day of January 1947, such person shall file his return for such taxable year under the provisions of the District of Columbia Income Tax Act as approved and enacted July 26, 1939, and as amended, and pay the taxes imposed by said act on his income for such taxable year at the times specified therefor in said act. Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. O'HARA:

Page 11, line 15, after the words "United States", insert "or employees of the United States Government."

Page 11, line 20, strike out comma after words "United States" and insert period. Strike out words "unless such officers" and all of lines 21 and 22, and add the following: "For the purposes of this act the domicile of such officer or employee shall be in the State in which he expressly declares to be the State of his domicile: Provided, That he shall have acquired a domicile in such State under the laws of such State prior to the beginning of the annual period for which the tax is claimed. Such declaration must be made in writing, under oath, to the assessor and the time for filing such declaration shall not expire until 60 days after written demand shall have been received by such officer or employee."

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. This amendment differs in form from the one the gentleman offered in committee, does it not?

Mr. O'HARA. That is correct. It is different so as to apply specifically, I may say to the gentleman from Virginia, to this language in the bill which defines residence, and it applies to only residents of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. And it would not affect any person who resided outside of the District of Columbia.

Mr. O'HARA. Not at all.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. In other words, it does not in any way interfere with the existing tax laws of any State.

Mr. O'HARA. Not at all. It applies only to this tax law in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized on his amendment.

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Chairman, I hope I will not need the additional time for which I have asked because of the fact that I spoke at some length on this matter during general debate.

This is the principle, I may say, of a bill which was adopted by this House on March 27, 1944, known as H. R. 3592; likewise of a bill which passed the House on March 5, 1945, H. R. 534.

This amendment applies to section (s) found on page 11 of the bill. Those of you who followed the reading of the bill noticed that "resident" is defined as being an individual domiciled within the District on the last day of the taxable year or a person who maintains a place of abode within the district for a period of 7 months. Members of Congress, Members of the Cabinet, and officers appointed by the President are specifically exempted; yet we have the situation where our secretaries, the help in our offices, and the Government employees are not exempted.

This amendment has a twofold purpose, Mr. Chairman. In the first place let me say—and I say it to the entire Membership—the purpose is to insist that those residents of the District of Columbia who claim to be domiciled in a State pay their taxes back home where they should be paid. That is the first principle. The second principle is: I maintain that every citizen whether he works for the Government, is a Member of Congress, or whoever he may be, has the right to his own domicile whether he lives in Virginia, Maryland, Minnesota, Massachusetts, or some other State. What happens? Your employees are down here for the same reason you are, because you are elected to office. You are exempt yourself under this law; your employees are not. They have no choice about it if they want to work for you, and they are harassed by this law in the District of Columbia. They are going to pay their taxes back home and they are going to have to pay them here because they cannot afford to go into court and fight over the matter of $25 or $30 tax.

It applies to the little man who works here for the Government because he is down here in Washington just as you and I are due to the fact that they tell him this is where he has to work. He is down here and I want him to pay his taxes out in the State where he belongs. I do not want him harassed by additional taxes down here. Oh, yes; they will say this tax is very light. The gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the committee, will say: "Oh, well, if he pays his tax at home then that ends it because this tax is very light."

Mr. Chairman, I am against the tax dodger. I want him to pay his taxes if he is living here. I do not want him to dodge his tax. Furthermore, my amendment says that he will have to file an affidavit under oath stating where his residence is. If he lies in that affidavit he is subject to the charge of perjury. If he says that his residence is back in Rhode Island, Louisiana, or Minnesota, or wherever it may be, all right, he has a right to make that claim under oath.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SPRINGER. In other words, each one of the persons who is working here for the Federal Government makes a declaration as to place of residence. When they make that declaration that they live in the State of Indiana or in Arkansas or whatever State they retain their residence in, then they are subject to taxation in that State?

Mr. O'HARA. That is right.

Mr. SPRINGER. And not subject to tax in the District of Columbia?

Mr. O'HARA. That is right. The language in the bill does not create that protection even to the District that my language gives and neither does it create a protection for the State back home where he should be paying the tax.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. How many States are there with no income tax law?

Mr. O'HARA. There are 16.

Mr. McCORMACK. What effect would it have on persons working here and claiming residence in those 16 States?

Mr. O'HARA. I may say to the gentleman that they have the same right under this affidavit to claim their residence back in those States. It is only justice to the residents of those 16 States who have an honest-to-goodness domicile back in 1 of those 16 States. They are paying taxes in some form back there other than income taxes.

Mr. McCORMACK. I will agree with the gentleman in relation to one who is in the employ of a Member of the House or Senate from those States and who lived there before they came to Washington, but what about those who are working year in and year out, month in and month out, in a department down here and who claim a residence in one of those States. How about them?

Mr. O'HARA. They are going to have to come in here and answer and prove in addition to their affidavit that they are bona fide residents back there and they will be subject to the tax back there. They can be pursued by those States, where they claim residence. This is not the case of tax dodging at all. I want those people to pay their taxes in their States. If they are dodging that let them pay it down here.

Mr. McCORMACK. I would not want the RECORD to show the slightest inclination on my part at all that I thought the gentleman had anything like that in mind because I know the gentleman has not. I was trying to pursue the matter to find out what the situation would be with reference to persons in different employment categories.

Mr. O'HARA. They have to make an honest statement. Suppose someone claimed that they are a resident of the State of Texas when they were not. If it was shown upon proof by the District of Columbia that they were not, that person would be subject to a charge of perjury in addition to the penalties provided in the bill.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. ABERNETHY. As the gentleman pointed out in connection with those 32 States which do have an income tax, it being agreed that the income tax in those 32 States is higher than that which exists in the District of Columbia, there is a possibility, and no doubt certainly many people working in the District of Columbia are paying their taxes here when they ought to be paying them back home?

Mr. O'HARA. The gentleman is exactly right.

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. I would like the gentleman to tell me if instead of this being a tax-dodging amendment, it is not a tax-collecting amendment?

Mr. O'HARA. It is a tax-collecting amendment.

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. It places the money where it belongs.

Mr. O'HARA. Right.

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. In addition to that, we get our money from the various States. As it is now and as it is under this bill, the money will not go where it belongs at all.

Mr. O'HARA. That is right.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Let us take two States for example, the State of Minnesota and the State of Oklahoma. If the person that is to be taxed lives in the District, and he claims Oklahoma or Minnesota as his place of domicile and pays taxes there, then he is exempt from the payment of any taxes under the provisions of this bill. The gentleman knows that is so.

Mr. O'HARA. That may be true. But we also have the situation existing in Virginia and Maryland, people working in the District, where they are hounding these people and they are paying the taxes back home and also forced to pay taxes here.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. That may be true.

Mr. O'HARA. Now, let us not make this a tax-beagle bill; let us make it a fair tax bill.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. That is what we are trying to do. We are trying to get away from tax evasion in the District.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. I would like to ask a question for information. I come from South Dakota, where we do not have a State income tax. In Massachusetts they do have a State income tax. Does it seem fair to the gentleman that we enact a District tax here which compels the people from South Dakota living in the District to pay a District tax, but which would not compel the people of Massachusetts to pay a tax?

Mr. O'HARA. Let me say to my good friend from South Dakota that we are legislating for the 48 States and the District of Columbia, because when you write a tax bill like this you are affecting every little person who comes in here, and when you make exemptions for yourselves and the higher-paid officers and give no consideration to the little people who are going to be hounded, I think it is mighty poor legislation.

Mr. MUNDT. I believe we should not discriminate between ourselves and our neighbors, and we should not discriminate between States.

Mr. O'HARA. We should not discriminate between the 32 States that have an income tax and the 16 who do not have an income tax, because they have, by agreement, some other tax, which is that share of the burden which would ordinarily be paid in income tax.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes to answer some questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, the gentleman well knows that in States like ours that have no income tax there are other taxes that compensate for that.

Mr. O'HARA. Yes.

Mr. MUNDT. So you are pyramiding a tax on one group of taxpayers and exempting others.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHURCH. The gentleman from South Dakota is in the same situation I am in. In Illinois a great part of the burden of taxes is taken care of by the sales tax. Many of these people are not here longer than 7 months, and so would be paying the sales tax in Illinois, if a resident of Illinois and in Illinois a part of the year. They are paying the sales taxes back home while back home.

Mr. O'HARA. Exactly.

Mr. CHELF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CHELF. As I understand it, this would make the person elect where he wanted to pay his taxes; in other words, to his home State or to the District.

Mr. O'HARA. He has to state where he claims he is a resident and has a domicile, nd he must swear to it.

Mr. CHELF. And once he has made that election or selection, then he would make an affidavit, and then would the gentleman say he would have to submit a receipt for income taxes?

Mr. O'HARA. No. We do not get a receipt for our income taxes back home. That is just the difficulty with some of these things. But, he makes his affidavit. He may be able to follow it up with a check that he paid it, or he may have to send and get a photostatic copy of it. But, he is going to be put to some trouble. If there is any question about his being a tax dodger, he ought to be put to that trouble.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. JENNINGS. It occurs to me that this is an effort to levy a double Federal income tax on these employees who are not citizens or residents of Washington. They are simply here in a transitory sense. Their residences are in their home States. This is their local residence, and as a rule that is always the principle upon which you determine where a person pays his tax.

Mr. O'HARA. That is the principle of this amendment.

Mr. JENNINGS. The gentleman is exactly right about it. It is fair. We ought not to make fish out of one man and fowl out of another.

Mr. O'HARA. Exactly.

Mr. JENNINGS. Let us have a sales tax if they want some money. I do not mind paying a sales tax on what I buy here, but I do not like to see these little people skinned alive.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. As I understand, the purpose of this amendment is to exempt people who pay taxes in other States.

Mr. O'HARA. That is right; who are employees of the Government.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Each State has its own method of taxing its citizens. If a person from Missouri, for example, which has an income tax and also a sales tax and a property tax, pays his taxes there, and another person comes from a State that does not have any income tax, each person paying according to the laws of his State, that person should be exempted just as much as the man who pays in accordance with the law of his State.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, and ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I am not an expert on income-tax questions, so I want to ask the gentleman this question. What is his construction of this bill as it stands on the question of whether the wife of a Congressman would be considered a resident of the District within the meaning of this bill for income-tax purposes?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I would assume, of course, that the exclusion of a Member of Congress would go also to his family.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. There has been some discussion of double taxation. Where is it?

Mr. DIRKSEN. There is no double taxation. Nobody has pointed it out. Nobody has pointed out where it is. That is the trouble. There are a lot of words, and there is a lot of sentimentality round here, but nobody puts it down.

You talk about the little people, and in the same breath talk about putting a sales tax on them. The little person will pay $10 under an income tax but pay $50 under a sales tax. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORAN] is going to offer the sales-tax amendment, and there will be no exclusions, so you will pay on food and clothing. If you are worried about the little people, of course, this is an out for them.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The facts are that unless we adopt this tax bill as it is we will in all probability have to resolve ourselves in favor of a sales tax.

Mr. DIRKSEN. We have to find the revenue somewhere. It is inescapable.

What does the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota do? No. 1, it specifically excludes all employees of the United States in Washington from the word and the definition "resident." There are hundreds of thousands here. Some of them have been here for 25 or 30 years. They have not been back home. They say, however, that that home is their domicile, but they live here 12 months in a year. They enjoy the benefits of everything the Nation's Capital has to offer. They enjoy the police protection, the fire protection, the parks, and the schools. The courts are open to them. In one case a gentleman came to me whose domicile is in Pennsylvania but who has lived here for 40 years and has contributed nothing to the upkeep of the District of Columbia.

There is an end to this business of whether you are a visitor or a sojourner in the District but can stay here a lifetime. We have it pretty easy. We have undertaken to say there will be no double taxation. If you pay back home in 32 States, you do not pay here. If you do not pay in the 16 States that have no income tax or have no intangible-property tax, and you are here on the last day of the taxable year and have been here for 7 months of the year, we say it is only fair that you should pay something to the upkeep of the District of Columbia. How easy it is.

The special adviser of this committee, who is one of the foremost experts on municipal taxation, Mr. Jackson, of Boston, spends 4 months a year in New York and 8 months a year in Massachusetts, but he pays an income tax in both Massachusetts and New York. We do not do that under this bill. We try to make it just as palatable and just as fair as possible.

Our friend from Minnesota talks about sending the beagle hounds out after people and harassing them.

We have had an income tax here since 1939 and it is for the purpose of getting away from harassment and getting the thing clarified that we have brought this bill to you. But he proposed by this language to exclude hundreds of thousands of people. It is said we ought to put ourselves as Members of Congress on the same basis as appointees. You are elected to office by the people in a constituency, and you have no choice except to come here unless you want to resign your commission. Then, you would not have to come to Washington and you would have no interest in it.

The other exclusion consists of those who hold tenure by sufferance of the President of the United States when confirmed by the Senate. Those are in the act today. That has been the law for 8 years. Nobody has quarreled about it.

Now, we are simply trying to put everybody who avails himself of all of the benefits of the Nation's Capital in the position of having to pay a little something.

The State of Maryland has resolved this question by her court of appeals. Virginia has resolved it. They say you cannot come here and stay a good many years and get a job on the Federal pay roll and buy a house in Bethesda or Rockville or Hyattsville or any place else and then claim you are a sojourner or a visitor. Here is a decision in 1942 of the Maryland Court of Appeals. They said very definitely they would go into the facts and see whether or not such a person is a sojourner or ought to be taxed for the benefits that are provided. The gentleman's amendment says that you have to expressly declare your domicile in some other State. The language of the amendment says:

> For the purpose of this act, the domicile of such officer or employee shall be the State which he expressly declares to be the State of domicile.

Let us look at that. You could not go into any ancillary facts for the purpose of proving domicile. Let me tell you the most interesting case with reference to that. This question was resolved by the circuit court of appeals in Washington. The Supreme Court of the United States said for the purpose of establishing residence and domicile they can determine your church affiliations, your lodge affiliations, and so forth, for the purpose of determining where you live and the benefits you have. When that determination was made a justice of the circuit court of appeals who had lived in Washington for a long time and who intended to stay here because he has a lifetime tenure resigned his job as vestryman in one of the prominent churches of Washington so that they could not hook it on him so that he would have to pay taxes here, since for the purpose of taxation he would be a resident here.

Talk about dodging? That is the thing we are trying to nail down in the bill as it came to you. Now, my friend the gentleman from Minnesota wants to tear it wide open and bring in the chaos and confusion that we have experienced up to the present time. We have had 2 cases in the Supreme Court, 8 in the circuit court of appeals, and another 300 cases in the district court, and several thousand cases in the assessor's hands.

If you adopt this amendment, then we are right where we were, and then the assessors will really have to harass them to find out where they live. Here is a chance to get away from this harassment. Here is a chance to get some clarification of these words "domicile" and "resident." Here is an opportunity to have the people bear a fair share of the benefits that they enjoy in an organized society in the place where they live, even though with their lips and with words issuing from their mouths they say, "Yes, we have enjoyed the benefits of Washington for 30 years, but I live in Illinois or Tennessee or Alabama or Minnesota."

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. FORAND. Does the gentleman care to express himself relative to the staffs in our own offices? Most of them are registered in our respective districts.

Mr. DIRKSEN. They would come within the provisions of the language on page 11. If they are here on the last day of the taxable year or if they have lived here continuously for 7 months, they would pay, and they have an offset. If they come from one of the 32 States whose income taxes are higher than in the District of Columbia, then, of course, that would be offset, and they do not pay.

A point has been made with respect to the 16 States where there is no income tax. It seems to me that Judge Jones of Alabama expressed it nicely when he said, "Are you going to let the exception govern the rule or the rule govern?" That is the answer.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Does the gentleman claim that the 16 States should be ignored and that they are merely a slight exception? That constitutes 33 percent of the 48 States.

Mr. DIRKSEN. No; certainly not. If they pay an intangible tax in those States they can offset that; and if they have an income tax they can offset that. But we say they must pay one tax somewhere. It is contended that it is double taxation. It is not. If you pay in Virginia you do not pay here. If you pay in Maryland you do not pay here. If you live in Illinois, my home State, where they have no income tax, and if somebody says, "Sure, I have lived in Washington for 2 or 3 years, but I vote in Illinois"—year after year they enjoy the benefits down here. Should they not pay a few dollars toward the support of this Government?

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Is it not up to the State where they are domiciled to collect the tax, and not the District of Columbia?

Mr. DIRKSEN. My friend knows that the tax collector of Springfield, Ill., is not going to come down here to Washington on that matter. So, year after year, look at the people who evade taxes. It is not illegal, because under the kind of law we have at the present time it is possible to do it.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The gentleman has not convinced me that there is no discrimination here. I am certain there is.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There is only one tax to pay. We do not care where you pay it. If you do not pay it back home you pay it here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Alabama. A proceeding for the collection of taxes is an action in personam; not an action in rem. It follows the situs of the real estate. It is to the person who enjoys the benefits of the Government where he resides.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. DEANE. The distinguished chairman has nade a very able presentation, but in his argument he did not discuss whether this is class legislation, or whether it is constitutional when we exempt the Members of Congress and we tax our secretaries in States that do not have income-tax laws.

Mr. DIRKSEN. All I can say is that provision has been the law for the past 18 years and, insofar as I know, it has not been impeached constitutionally, as yet.

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. I understood the gentleman to say that under the provision of subsection (s) on page 11 of the bill, if the tax were paid back home they would not have to pay it here or that he would be given credit for it. I would like to have the gentleman point out that provision.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is in a subsequent provision. I do not have it before me just now, but I think it is on page 44. However, it is very definite.

I hope the amendment will not be adopted, because you will tear the vitals out of this thing and we will be right back where we started. Then, of course, it becomes necessary to find additional revenue, and you will have to entertain this question of a sales tax or some other tax, because here is a deficit that has to be met. It is the obligation of the Congress, which has life and death power over the District of Columbia, to point the way and develop the revenue.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, this is the issue that I brought before the Committee in general debate earlier today. Let us not for a moment overlook the real issue that we have here. It is not whether or not it is going to be double taxation on any individual. It is whether or not the employees in States that do not have an intangible tax or an income tax are going to have to pay an income tax in the District of Columbia. That is the issue that you have here.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. O'HARA] proposes, if I understand his amendment, that Federal employees from States which do not have an income-tax law will be treated just as Federal employees from States who do have income-tax laws.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. The State of Illinois has no income tax, but let me also state there is a great burden on the taxpayers of Illinois, paid for by those taxpayers in the nature of a sales tax.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes. The point I was trying to make——

Mr. CHURCH. I know, but that is an intangible tax and not included in this bill as an exemption.

Mr. HARRIS. But the employees of the Federal Government residing in the District of Columbia, although they pay that intangible tax in the State of Illinois, will be required to pay an income tax in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. If they pay an intagible personal tax or a property tax they have the right to deduct it.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee how many people he thinks would keep a detailed account, a day by day account, of the amount of money they pay under the sales tax in Illinois and take that as an offset on what he pays here.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The gentleman made no mention of sales tax. He was speaking about intangible and personal property taxes.

Mr. HARRIS. But the gentleman from Illinois mentioned the sales tax.

Again the real issue here is whether we shall say to the 16 States of this Nation which do not have an income tax that they are going to have to pay in the Distric of Columbia.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield.

Mr. POAGE. In my home town the property tax for State, city, county, and school purposes is approximately three times what it is in the city of Washington. Because of that tax we do not have to levy an income tax and have not levied an income tax, but under this bill the District in effect would be saying what kind of tax we can impose upon our own people.

Mr. HARRIS. That is exactly what the gentleman from Minnesota proposes to correct by his amendment. His purpose is to have the Congress say to the States that they may have the privilege of levying the kind of tax they want in their State and that the citizens of their State are not to be harassed some other place in the United States which has adopted some form of tax the other State may not care to adopt.

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield.

Mr. JENNINGS. This amendment simply says to the taxing power of the Government, "You cannot within the District of Columbia levy a double income tax on somebody who happens to be here as a transient."

Mr. HARRIS. I disagree with the gentleman. There is no double tax levied here because if there is an income tax in the State of Tennessee, then a Tennessean in the District of Columbia would receive credit for it for District of Columbia income tax purposes. If the Tennessee tax is the higher then he pays no tax here.

Mr. JENNINGS. But the point is that these people are not residents within the contemplation or the general origin of the law; they are simply here temporarily.

Mr. HARRIS. I agree with the gentleman that it is not the province of this Congress through a bill such as this to impose on any State any certain type of tax or to prevent them from adopting any form of tax they wish. We ought not to give the power to the District of Columbia to say that because a resident of their State working here does not pay a certain kind of tax in his home State the District is going to make him pay here.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield.

Mr. FORAND. I agree with the gentleman that this would not be a double income tax, but it would be an additional income tax upon those whose State tax rates were below this rate.

Mr. HARRIS. It would in my opinion be saying to a State, "We are going to penalize the Federal employee from your State because you do not have an income tax." It would not be a double income tax.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. I have asked for this additional time for the purpose of asking a question of the very able gentleman who is the chairman of the subcommittee and who has done a fine piece of work in writing this bill.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I wish to refer to the point raised by the gentleman from Rhode Island, the case of a State where the income-tax rate is lower than in the District of Columbia. In such case the person would have to pay a tax; but the fact is that the rate in the District of Columbia is far, far less than it is in any other State that has an income tax.

Mr. FORAND. But in the case of a State where the rate was lower this would be an additional tax.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. He would be exempted from paying a District income tax if his home rates were higher; and the reverse would apply likewise.

Mr. HARRIS. The point that I want to emphasize is that we are dealing with a policy.

I wish to ask the chairman of the subcommittee, who is opposing this, how much revenue would be lost to the District of Columbia assuming the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota were adopted? How much would it take from his estimated revenues under this bill as now written?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The gentleman understands that this amendment offered on the impulse of the moment makes it impossible to give an intelligent estimate; but if the Federal employees of the 16 States that have no income-tax law were exempted it would make a material difference. We, of course, have no way of estimating what the amount would be by way of changed revenue. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] just told me, it will kill a very important source of revenue upon which we depend to balance the books this year.

Mr. HARRIS. In other words, does the gentleman estimate that these 15 States that have employees here that do not report an income tax back in their States will pay an additional $3,100,000 income tax in the District of Columbia?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The gentleman can make no assumption such as that from what I said. We know in connection with the Federal payments in the past year that over 280,000 people gave the District of Columbia as their place of residence, yet in the District of Columbia less than 85,000 taxpayers paid an income tax in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS. The gentleman knows that not everyone in the District of Columbia, not everyone who resides here, pays an income tax. They do not make that kind of money. There are a lot of people in the District of Columbia who do not make enough money to pay an income tax, though the exemption is rather low.

I would like to say one or two things further. I do not think the gentleman should in any way by extenuating circumstances or inference leave the impression that any citizen will purge himself in order to avoid paying an honest income tax that he is due to pay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There is no such implication and, in the second place, now that the gentleman has raised this question, look what this amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. O'HARA] will do. It places all the Federal employees in one group, but what about those people in Washington who are not Federal employees?

Mr. HARRIS. They have got to file an affidavit.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That amendment puts them in two groups, whether they work for the Federal Government or do not.

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment makes them file an affidavit stating that they live in the District of Columbia and are residents here.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Why make fish of one and fowl of the other?

Mr. HARRIS. Does the gentleman imply that a person, regardless of where he is from, in this country, is going to purge himself to avoid paying an honest income tax to the District?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Why, certainly not, but the language of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota says that this shall not include any elective officer, Cabinet member or employees of the United States Government. Now, what about those who do not work for the Government?

Mr. HARRIS. Does the gentleman think his own State of Illinois could provide a tax for that State and for the people of that State wherever they live?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No, but that begs the question with respect to this amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I disagree with the gentleman. Does the gentleman deny this does not apply generally to the 16 States that do not have an income tax provision?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No. We simply contend that they ought to pay a tax somewhere for the enjoyment of the benefits they have as a result of an organized existence in our society. If they pay back home they do not have to pay here. If they are not here for 7 months of the year or a resident on the last day of the taxable year, they would not pay.

Mr. HARRIS. Then, is this the issue: That the people from the State of Arkansas, where I live, will pay their income tax back home, consequently they will not pay any income tax in the District of Columbia, while people from Pennsylvania, which does not have an income tax law, will have to pay in the District of Columbia?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Does the gentleman want someone to enjoy the fruits of municipal existence without paying a little something for it? That is the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment close in 20 minutes, the last 5 minutes to be reserved for the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. POAGE. Yes, sir; let me answer the gentleman's question. As a Congressman from the State of Texas, I will not have to pay any income tax to the District of Columbia under the terms of this bill, but the girl in my office who makes $2,000 a year will have to pay an income tax to the District of Columbia, although her time spent in Washington is the same as mine, and she has to pay out of that $2,000 a year her transportation to and from Washington whereas the Government pays mine for at least one round trip. That is what this bill does. That is the kind of bill that is offered in the name of justice and equal taxation.

Mr. MORRIS. Can that be justified?

Mr. POAGE. Of course not.

Mr. MORRIS. Is there any way in which we can justify it?

Mr. POAGE. Of course not. Not unless you want to try to justify special privileges for yourself at the expense of your employees, and I know the gentleman from Oklahoma does not want to do that, and neither do I.

Mr. MORRIS. If there is, I would like to hear it.

Mr. POAGE. I, too, would like to hear a justification of it, but I am not going to try to justify anything so unfair as this bill. The legislation on its face condemns itself as being an appeal for votes for Members of Congress. The legislation on its face condemns itself as being unfair and inequitable against those least able to express opposition thereto. The legislation on its face condemns itself as being demagogic in that it seeks to secure the support of the Representatives of the majority of the States of the Union without any regard for the rights of those 16 States that have, through their duly elected representatives in their legislatures, adopted other systems of taxation.

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. Just a moment, and I will be glad to yield. First, let me call this to the attention of the House, because I think it is of vital importance, and I hope that the Members will give me their attention for just a moment. I hope the distinguished gentleman from Illinois will listen to this. Out of keeping with the thoughtful study that the gentleman from Illinois generally gives to matters of this kind, he has this afternoon indicated that he has not thoroughly thought this through. I hope I may have his attention. There is no State in this Union that does not levy taxes sufficient to run that State. And the cities and other subdivisions of each levy sufficient taxes of one form or another to run their governments. As far as the people of the District of Columbia are concerned and as far as this Congress is concerned, it should not make any difference whether they levy it in the form of an income tax or whether they levy it in the form of a property tax, a sales tax, intangible tax, or whatnot. Each State and its subdivisions has its own system of taxation and each State and its subdivisions pays for running its own government out of its own system of taxation. I wish the gentleman from Illinois would listen to me, because I think it is important. Each State in this Union pays for the running of government, and the various localities pay for the running of their governments. These bills are not paid by this Congress, nor are they paid by the people of the District of Columbia. Why does it make any difference to the District of Columbia or the citizens therein or this Congress whether the State of Texas or the State of Illinois levies income taxes or whether they levy property taxes? Whatever form of tax they have, they do not levy it on anybody else except on their own citizens. It happens that in my State and it happens that in the State of Illinois, the people through their legislative assemblies have decided that they would rather levy a higher property tax than to impose an income tax. Whether that is right or wrong, I do not know. I personally, but for my belief that we should divide the forms of taxation between the Federal and local government, might vote for an income tax; I think there is much to be said for it, but my State and 15 other States have decided that they do not want that kind of tax. Why should our citizens be penalized?

Now, this much no one can deny. We levy enough taxes to run the State of Texas and the State of Illinois levies enough taxes to support the State of Illinois, whether they levy it in income taxes or not. So. when the gentleman tells this committee that all he wants is to see that these people pay their share of taxation somewhere, that every citizen of this Nation pays his fair share of taxation somewhere, I do not think he has made out a case for Federal control of State taxation. It is not the duty of this Congress to try to enforce the State laws in Texas, New York, or California, or anywhere else. That is the duty of the State.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The difference is simply this, in the great State of Texas, the legislature does not have to pay any attention to a viewpoint expressed by somebody from Illinois or elsewhere. In the State of Illinois our legislature does not have to pay any attention to the viewpoint expressed by somebody from Texas. But, when it comes to the District of Columbia, which must come to the national lawmaking body, almost invariably they become the victims of the viewpoint that is expressed from the standpoint of Illinois or the standpoint of Texas, and that is the difficulty that we have here, in getting people, whose domiciles may be in Texas or Illinois, or who have lived here for 15 or 20 years, to carry their fair share of the burden. That is the difficulty.

Mr. POAGE. The gentleman again begs the question because, as I have shown, and as no one will deny, the State of Texas and the State of Illinois levy taxes on their people to support their State government. Why should it make any difference to the people of the District of Columbia whether we get those taxes in the form of property taxes or in the form of sales taxes or in the form of income taxes? Actually, in the town where I live the property tax for all purposes, State, county, school, and city, is approximately three times what the property tax is in the District of Columbia, and the tax here includes all the property taxes paid. Why, then, if the people of the District of Columbia want to raise more taxes, they might follow the same policy that the people of Texas follow. I do not say that they necessarily should use our system, but before we decide that the people of the District are imposed on by citizens of other States, we might consider bringing up the property tax in the District and the gasoline tax. If the people of Texas are willing to burden themselves with a property tax far higher than that collected in the District, why should Texas be penalized? Would the sponsors of this legislation be willing to give the citizens of Texas who pay property taxes in that State an offset against any property taxes they might owe in the District? If you propose to levy the same property tax on anyone owning property in the District, regardless of the property taxes paid in that person's home State, why not levy the same income tax regardless of what income tax the person pays in his home State?

I will tell you why they apply a different rule as between incomes and property taxes. I will show you what this discrimination does. I will show you who will be penalized. The gentleman from Oklahoma called attention to who is penalized under this bill. Here is the actual way it works out. In the State of Texas I happen to be blessed with a little property on which I pay property taxes. I as a citizen of Texas, living in a good-sized town, pay $6 per $100 on the property I own in Waco, Tex. They pay $1.75 for $100 in the District of Columbia, incidentally. I could probably get by paying $1.75 on my property in the State of Texas as the people in the District of Columbia do, and by paying only a 3-cent gasoline tax as the people of the District of Columbia do if my State were willing to levy an income tax on that $2,000-a-year stenographer that this bill proposes to tax. But I am glad that in the State of Texas we believe that those who are a little better fixed and own a little more of this world's goods should bear the burden of taxes to support our State and local governments, that those who have property should pay for the running of this State, in order that we might exempt those who have a smaller income, and those on whom the taxes levied in this bill would fall so heavily. The State of Texas collects largely from property owners, but it collects from its people all the money we spend for running the State of Texas and all of the subdivisions thereof. The property owners of Texas and the automobile drivers of Texas pay more than the property owners or the automobile drivers of the District of Columbia in order that we may give relief to the small wage earner. The proponents of this bill now come forward and say to us, "Even though you people in Texas have taxed yourselves to exempt this $2,000-per-year clerk, even though you pay three times as much property tax as the citizens of the District in order that she may be relieved, we do not like your system, and therefore we are going to tax this girl even though you people are willing to pay her share at home."

What right has Congress to come along and say to us, "We do not like the form of taxation you have in Texas. Of course, you are taxing your people just as much as they are being taxed in the District of Columbia or any other State. Of course, you are running the State government and all its subdivisions just as well as the States that levy an income tax. Of course, you are taxing your people all you need to, but you are taxing them in some other form that the members of this committee dislike." It is not a question, as the gentleman from Illinois suggested, of whether the people of Texas are paying all the taxes they should. It is purely a question of whether or not the members of this committee like the form of taxation we have in my State. It is purely a question that the Representatives here who are trying to saddle this kind of law on us do not like the form of taxation we have and want to tell us what form of taxation we shall levy. They want to assume for themselves the power of our State legislature to decide how we shall levy taxes in the several States. Of course, they say, "We simply want to catch the tax dodger." This is not a question of tax dodging, because every State in this Union levies taxes enough to run its State, and I contend that the people of my State have a right to say to that $2,000-a-year stenographer, "We are going to see that you are exempt from taxation even though in order to give you that exemption the man who owns 100,000 acres of land must be taxed more." Is there anything wrong in our doing that? Not in my book; there is not. But this committee is trying to tell us that that stenographer has to pay taxes, and that if the State of Texas wants her to get a fair deal, then the State of Texas has to reduce the taxes that we levy upon the great wealth in our State, and put part of the burden on small salaries. I do not believe this Congress has either the right or the desire to do that sort of thing.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. FISHER. In this tax bill which proposes to raise a certain amount of money to help run the District of Columbia the net effect of the provision is to make those present here from 16 States pay a larger proportion in contribution to that amount than those from the other 32 States.

Mr. POAGE. That is exactly right; regardless of what benefits they get from the District of Columbia. It bears no relation to the benefits they get. Certainly it cannot be said that the girl working in my office gets greater benefits from the District of Columbia than the young lady who works for the gentleman from Oklahoma, where they do have an income tax.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Does the gentleman know any place in this Nation where property owners have a better return on their investment and a more certain return than in the city of Washington? Further, the city of Washington has the lowest tax on real property in the Nation.

Mr. POAGE. That is right. The gentleman and I and everybody else who lives any part of the year pay for that. We would pay any increase in the property tax, of course. You know that rentals always carry the property tax. Do not tell me that the people who are here in Washington do not contribute anything to the support of the District government, because they must. You cannot live in a community without contributing to the support of that community. The renters of Washington pay their full share of the property taxes in Washington, of course.

I recognize that these conditions apply to all citizens who are temporarily in Washington, whether they are Government employees or not, and I, therefore, had prepared an amendment to page 44. My amendment is at the clerk's desk. It does all this amendment does and more. It is applicable to all who are bona fide domiciliaries of any State, whether they are Government employees or not. If this amendment is defeated, I shall, of course, insist on my amendment, but since this amendment is before us and since it covers most of the cases of injustice, I shall certainly support it.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MORRIS. I want to get this straight and I ask the question purely as a matter of information. Is it true, as a result and as a concrete situation that an employee in a Congressman's office coming from a State where there is no income tax would have to pay an income tax?

Mr. POAGE. Yes. That is exactly what this bill as it now stands provides. I know the gentleman from Oklahoma will agree with me that that is not the kind of equal or exact justice that this Congress should accord the citizens of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. As a member of this subcommittee, as I said this morning, we have tried very hard to devise a tax bill which we thought was fair and which would raise the necessary deficit of $10,500,000.

We could have come here today and proposed a sales tax instead of this income tax. Then we would have the same thing. Members would be getting red in the face and raising their blood pressure because we propose to put a sales tax on poor people. Now, somebody has to pay some taxes. This amendment would not only cut out a considerable amount of the anticipated revenue under this bill, but it is an open invitation to every person who ever lived in any other State of the Union to come in and say, "No, I was born in Texas, and I am, therefore, domiciled in Texas, and I do not have to pay any taxes."

I do not know how many of you are familiar with the language of this amendment. All they have to do is say, "I am domiciled in Texas, or I am domiciled in Tennessee."

Gentlemen have been saying, "You ought not to tell the people of Texas what kind of laws Texas should have." We are not telling Texas anything. We are just saying to the residents of the District of Columbia who come here and live and raise their families and educate their children in the public schools, who enjoy all the benefits of this municipality and who pay no income tax elsewhere, that they must share in the burden and the expenses and help us carry on the city which gives you the benefits that you enjoy.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. I do not claim to be an expert on all the technical matters involved in this proposal. However, my understanding is that this matter has been under consideration by the Committee on the District of Columbia for some months and that careful consideration has been given to the problem in all of its different phases, and that the bill was finalliy reported out by a vote of 15 to 2. In view of that fact, it seems to me we ought to indulge the presumption that the committee has gone into the matter and that the legislation is such that we can support it, and I propose to support it.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. MORRIS. I do presume that. I think that is a fair presumption. Why should not the Members of Congress who get the same benefits as those in the offices get come under the provisions of this law?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. If the gentleman cares to offer an amendment to include Congressmen, so far as I am concerned I shall not oppose it. I am inclined to suspect that a good many others would.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. The gentleman from Indiana asked the gentleman from Virginia if this bill had not been considered by the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. That is the subcommittee.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. That was not the whole committee.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. It was considered by the subcommittee. I want to say that during the consideration by the subcommittee public hearings were held and everybody had an opportunity to come in and express their opposition to this proposal. As far as I know, I do not know of any citizen of the District of Columbia who did come in and oppose it. As a matter of fact, I doubt it very much whether the people of the District of Columbia feel the same way about this matter of evading taxes as some Members of Congress would seem to imply that they do.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Is it not true that the same proposition was before this Congress within the last 2 or 3 years and was defeated by this House?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Not that I know of.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Absolutely not. This matter was disposed of in the Income Tax Act of 1939, which is the law of the District today. What we are endeavoring to do is to reform and make more certain this question of domicile and residence, so that the harassing, as was spoken of, can be stopped and we can determine and ascertain who should pay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virgina [Mr. SMITH] has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORRIS] for 5 minutes.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I claim to be no expert in these matters. I definitely am not. I appreciate the work that has been done by the committee. I compliment the members on their arduous labors, but I cannot for the life of me see how it could be possible and be fair and just to tax those who are least able to pay and yet permit those who are most able to pay to escape. It evidently cannot be, unless somebody answers that. That is a point I make in addition to this other point. I agree with these gentlemen who come from States where they do not have an income tax, that those States evidently levy heavier burdens on real estate and other matters, which equalizes that. Consequently, those people who come from those States which do not have income taxes, it must be assumed, are already actually paying as much as those who come from States where we do have income-tax laws. Therefore, when you levy a burden of District income taxes on them, here, you do in fact put an extra tax burden upon them. And again on the first point I made how can it be just and fair to tax the employees in our offices and not tax the Congressmen? I just cannot see it.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORRIS. I yield.

Mr. FORAND. The bill provides that a person living in the District more than 7 months would be subject to the tax.

Mr. MORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FORAND. Someone approached me a few moments ago and asked me how long my staff was in Washington. If the Congress is not to adjourn until the end of July, that is 7 months. Our committee has already received notice unofficially that we are coming back in October. My staff will have to come back. They will have to pay travel expenses back and forth, and will be in the District more than 7 months, and will have to maintain their apartments in the District. Therefore, they will be subject to the tax.

Mr. MORRIS. That is correct. That is a concrete illustration which proves, in my judgment, that the bill is not good as it is written.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The bill also provides that in those States, some 16 in number, that have intangible and personal property taxes, the amount of money they pay shall be deducted, the same as would occur in the cases of those whose personal income tax is paid in other States. The same principle applies to both States and both taxes.

Mr. MORRIS. Well, I cannot quite follow you on that. I believe the only fair way to do it would be to use the sales tax. I think the people who live here ought to pay some taxes. I believe the only way you can equitably arrange it will be by a sales tax. I understand there will be an amendment offered to that effect.

Now, about this committee report, I am sure the members of that committee are all patriotic and splendid men. Some of them are real tax experts, but in my judgment there is nothing sacrosanct about the report of any of these committees. Just because they bring in a report does not mean that we ought to follow it blindly. I am saying to you that I do presume the report of any committee is correct. I presume it is, but when such presumption has been overcome by direct logic and reason and common sense, I am not going to follow it and I do not care what committee it is.

The remarks I have just made were extemporaneous. Later on, in the RECORD, it will appear that this amendment that I have just spoken in favor of—the O'Hara amendment—carried, and therefore it becomes unnecessary for me to offer an amendment as suggested in the RECORD by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, may I say at the outset that this committee has struggled with this tax revenue bill ever since the middle of last January. From that time to the present we have been continually with it. We realize, of course, the tremendous cost of municipal government. Let me say at this point that I have spent nearly 25 years of my life with this type of problem in pretty responsible positions; and I have some conception of what the real difficulty is that faces the District of Columbia as we look ahead over the period of a few years in respect to the financing of the obligations of this community. To that end a $10,000,000 deficit was facing the District at the end of 1948, a $12,000,000 deficit at the end of 1949, and a $20,000,000 deficit at the end of 1950. The District Commissioners had recommended nine different types of revenue we could develop here under legislation they recommended.

We feel that we should concentrate on the most basic of the taxes, as I said in the beginning, real estate, income, and the Federal contribution. It seems to me we should try to meet the financial obligations of the District government from these three sources instead of going into the field of these so-called special or emergency taxes; and under the provisions of this bill we hope to get the revenue to run the District for the next 2 years. Much has been said, of course, about the so-called sales tax. Under the sales tax, the individual would pay more than under the so-called income tax we are proposing in this bill. As an illustration let us assume that an individual has an income of $8,000 at the present time, that his personal exemption and exemptions for dependents bring that down to where his taxable income was $5,000. Under this bill he would pay only $25. The same person under the 2 percent sales tax that has been suggested by the Commissioners and that we have not approved, he would pay $32.84.

As has been said earlier on the floor all taxes are onerous. There is an old adage that says that "taxes are paid in the sweat of the brow of the man who labors." It makes no difference from what source it may come. We are trying to provide here a basic system of taxation which will meet the requirements of the District of Columbia.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I cannot; I have only 5 minutes.

Mr. POAGE. The gentleman has ten.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. But five of that must go to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

So it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, in the interest of the equalization of the tax load, of the necessity to meet the responsibilities of the District government that we ought to approve the committee's report. We feel that after many months of study and some knowledge of the subject that it is the most fair, the most equitable, the most constructive we can recommend to the Congress. To that end I hope the commitee bill will be accepted. The Commissioners are in favor of the bill, the subcommittee is in favor of the bill, and the full Committee on the District of Columbia which has studied the bill is likewise in favor of it as was shown by their vote reporting it out 15 to 2. I sincerely trust that the bill as we have recommended it will be approved.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. The gentleman will recall that only a few years before the war the Federal Government contributed about half of the District's budget or nearly 48 percent. That budget has been doubled almost.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Doubled and a half.

Mr. SHORT. Is it not a fact that the population of greater Washington has almost doubled until we have over 1,200,000 people in the great metropolitan area of Washington?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The population of the District of Columbia has increased in a period of 7 years from 690,000 people to 860,000 people in the District itself.

Mr. SHORT. The Members of the House should bear in mind that while the real-estate-tax rate of $1.75 is one of the cheapest and lowest in this country, the assessed valuation of the property in the District is almost 100 percent, whereas in different States it is perhaps only 50 percent of the actual valuation.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. May I answer that question as I answered it earlier in the afternoon. Upon the revised revaluation that is being put into effect in the District of Columbia this year, according to the Assessor's report itself, the assessment compared to actual value represents 70 percent.

Mr. SHORT. Is it not also significant for us to bear in mind, to be perfectly fair with the people of the city of Washington, that the Federal Government owns about one-fifth of the total acreage of the District of Columbia?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. More than half.

Mr. SHORT. About 19 or 20 percent?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Forty-nine percent.

Mr. SHORT. About 19 or 20 percent of the acreage and more than $843,000,000 in buildings which are tax exempt and on which the Government does not pay a dime?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, this is the most equitable tax system we have been able to devise after many months of study and I trust the committee will accept it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. O'HARA].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SMITH of Virginia) there were—ayes 78, noes 30.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MASON: On page 11, line 15, after the words "United States" insert a comma, strike out the following word "or" and insert in place thereof the words "nor shall it include."

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, this is a clarifying amendment to clarify the last clause. I am sure the committee has no objection because it does not change the text or the meaning of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, just how would this apply in view of the amendment that has just been adopted?

Mr. DIRKSEN. As between the two clauses in there, the last sentence of subsection (s), page 11, reads such that you do not make a distinction between appointive officers and elective officers. That is the only thing the amendment is designed to correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that title II may be considered as read and open to amendment at any point.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORAN] where he expects to offer his proposed amendment?

Mr. HORAN. My amendment to the bill would come on page 84.

Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order at this time.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, except I would like to ask if the chairman of the committee would not explain these titles briefly, as we agree to them having been read, where there are no amendments.

Mr. DIRKSEN. In explaining the titles where there are no amendments, I think I can say that virtually they are the administrative titles dealing with gross income and net income following the Federal law, with the exception of amounts. As the gentleman knows, the rate begins at 1 percent and goes up to 3 percent over $20,000. Then there are the standard deductions. There are personal deductions of $1,000 in case of an individual and $2,000 in the case of married persons.

Mr. HARRIS. And that would include titles 2, 3, and 4?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes, virtually all of the general provisions, and would go all the way down, I think, to the end of the income tax title of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. On what page would that be?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I would say it would go all the way to "licenses" page 79, title XIV.

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. On page 22, paragraph 3, taxes:

All taxes imposed upon the taxpayer and paid or accrued during the taxable year except—

(A) Income taxes;

Is it not a fact that in practically every State, if not every State in which there are income tax laws in force, 32 of them, they exempt income taxes paid to the Federal Government; I mean, allow that as a proper deduction. Why should it not be true in reference to income taxes which are sought to be levied by the District of Columbia?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the titles with reference to the income-tax provisions and relating to the administrative features of it being considered as read and open to amendment. As I understood the gentleman from Illinois, he proposed that the bill be read by title.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered as read down to article II on page 84.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, earlier in the afternoon the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS], became rather vehement in his demands that the House know what is in the bill, and he forced the reading of the bill. Now I want to ask the gentleman from Arkansas if he feels that the House has been sufficiently educated at this point so that we can dispense with the reading of it?

Mr. HARRIS. I think the House was sufficiently advised to vote on an amendment awhile ago that was highly important and the reading of the bill thus far has been of immense value, and I think the gentleman himself is probably enlightened.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. In line with that confession on the part of the gentleman from Arkansas, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I am not going to object, and I hope the unanimous-consent request will be granted. The situation is such that we must complete action on this bill this evening. If we can dispense with the reading and proceed with the consideration of the bill, I am quite sure we can finish it without having to stay here too late.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman advise us what the next order of business will be?

Mr. HALLECK. I have just talked with the minority leader. I think probably we will meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning. The action on Reorganization Plan II is privileged. As I understand, that will come up next, and be followed by further consideration of the so-called Mundt bill.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. May I make this suggestion in connection with these 11 o'clock meetings called at the last minute, that Congress be given more notice, if possible, for this reason. You cannot do business in the House unless the committees can do business. Under the Reorganization Act the committees are busy. When committees have hearings set, or executive sessions, and then the night before notice is given that we will come in at 11 o'clock, it throws all the machinery out of gear. I shall not object, but I do wish the majority and minority leaders will give consideration to that.

Mr. HALLECK. If the gentleman will permit me, I have not now asked unanimous consent to meet at 11 o'clock in the morning. I simply made that announcement at this time in order that the Members might be apprised of what is proposed. If the gentleman from Michigan and other committe chairmen have committee meetings scheduled for the morning of such a character that the 11 o'clock meeting will interfere, then the gentleman can suggest that to me, and certainly that would be given every consideration before any such request for early meeting is made. Of course, generally speaking, I did not anticipate that we would be this long on this bill. We have a number of things we must dispose of. We have a lot of appropriation bills coming along, in respect to which we have dead lines to meet. I do not like to have the House convene before the customary noon hour any more than anyone else. It is simply in an effort to expedite business that the suggestion is made.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The remainder of article I is as follows:

TITLE II—EXEMPT ORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 1. The following organizations shall be exempt from taxation under this article:

(a) Labor organizations.

(b) Fraternal beneficiary societies, orders, or associations, (1) operating under the lodge system or for the exclusive benefit of the members of a fraternity itself operating under the lodge system, and (2) providing for the payment of life, sick, or accident benefits to the members of such society, order, or association, or their dependents.

(c) Cemetery companies owned and operated exclusively for the benefit of their members and which are not operated for profit; and any corporation chartered solely for burial purposes as a cemetery corporation and not permitted by its charter to engage in any business not necessarily incident to that purpose, no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private individual or shareholder.

(d) Corporations, and any community chest, fund, or foundation, organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, literary, or educational purposes, or for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals, to a substantial extent within the District, no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private individual or shareholder, and no part of the activities of which is carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting to influence legislation.

(e) Business leagues, chambers of commerce, real-estate boards, or boards of trade, not organized or operated for profit and no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private individual or shareholder.

(f) Civic leagues or organizations not organized for profit but operated exclusively for the promotion of social welfare, or local associations of employees, the membership of which is limited to the employees of a designated person or persons in a particular municipality, and the net earnings of which are devoted principally to charitable, educational, or recreational purposes within the District.

(g) Banks, trust companies, building and loan associations, insurance companies, companies which guarantee the fidelity of any individual or individuals, such as bonding companies, and companies which furnish abstracts of title or which insure titles to real estate, all of which pay taxes on their gross earnings, premiums, or gross receipts under existing laws of the District.

(h) Corporations organized for the exclusive purpose of holding title to property, collecting income therefrom, and turning over the entire amount thereof, less expenses, to an organization which itself is exempt from the tax imposed by this article.

(i) Corporations organized under acts of Congress, if such corporations are instrumentalities of the United States and if, under such acts, as amended and supplemented, such corporations are exempt from Federal income taxes.

(j) Voluntary employees' beneficiary associations providing for the payment of life, sick, or accident benefits to the members of such association or their dependents, if (1) no part of their net earnings inures (other than through such payments) to the benefit of any private individual or shareholder, and (2) 85 per centum or more of the income consists of amounts collected from members for the sole purpose of making such payments and meeting expenses.

(k) Voluntary employees' beneficiary associations providing for the payment of life, sick, or accident benefits to the members of such association or their dependents or their designated beneficiaries, if (1) admission to membership in such association is limited to individuals who are officers or employees of the United States Government or the government of the District of Columbia, and (2) no part of the net earnings of such association inures (other than through such payments) to the benefit of any private individual or shareholder.

TITLE III—NET INCOME, GROSS INCOME AND EXCLUSIONS THEREFROM, AND DEDUCTIONS

SEC. 1. Net income: For the purposes of this article and wherever appearing herein, unless otherwise required by the context, the words "net income" mean the gross income of a taxpayer less the deductions allowed by this article.

SEC. 2. Gross income and exclusions therefrom: (a) The words "gross income" include gains, profits, and income derived from salaries, wages, or compensation for personal services of whatever kind and in whatever form paid, including salaries, wages, and compensation paid by the United States to its officers and employees to the extent the same is not exempt under this article, or income derived from any trade or business or sales or dealings in property, whether real or personal, other than capital assets as defined in this article, growing out of the ownership, or sale of, or interest in, such property; also from rent, royalties, interest, dividends, securities, or transactions of any trade or business carried on for gain or profit, or gains or profits, and income derived from any source whatever.

(b) The words "gross income" shall not include the following:

(1) Proceeds of life-insurance policies: The proceeds of life-insurance policies paid by reason of the death of the insured, whether in a single sum or otherwise (but if such amounts are held by the insured under an agreement to pay interest thereon, the interest payments shall be included in gross income).

(2) Annuities, and so forth: (a) Amounts received (other than amounts paid by reason of the death of the insured and interest payments on such amounts and other amounts received as annuities) under a life-insurance or endowment contract, but if such amounts (when added to amounts received before the taxable year under such contract) exceed the aggregate premiums or consideration paid (whether or not paid during the taxable year), then the excess shall be included in gross income. Amounts received as an annuity under an annuity or endowment contract shall be included in gross income; except that there shall be excluded from gross income the excess of the amount received in the taxable year over an amount equal to 3 percent of the aggregate premiums or consideration paid for such annuity (whether or not paid during such year), until the aggregate amount excluded from gross income under this title in respect to such annuity equals the aggregate premiums or consideration paid for such annuity. In the case of a transfer for a valuable consideration, by assignment or otherwise, of a life-insurance, endowment, or annuity contract, or any interest therein, only the actual value of such consideration and the amount of the premiums and other sums subsequently paid by the transferee shall be exempt from taxation under subsection (1) or this subsection. This subsection and subsection 2 (b) (1) of this title shall not apply with respect to so much of a payment under a life-insurance, endowment, or annuity contract, or any interest therein, as, under section 3 (a) (10) of this title, is includible in the gross income of the recipient.

(B) Employees' annuities: If an annuity contract is purchased by an employer for an employee under a plan with respect to which the employer's contribution is deductible under subsection 3 (a) (11) of this title, the employee shall include in his income the amounts received under such contract for the year received except that if the employee paid any of the consideration of the annuity, the annuity shall be included in his income as provided in subsection 2 (b) (2) (A) of this title, the consideration for such annuity being considered the amount contributed by the employee. In all other cases, if the employee's rights under the contract are nonforfeitable except for failure to pay future premiums, the amount contributed by the employer for such annuity contract on and after such rights become nonforfeitable shall be included in the income of the employee in the year in which the amount is contributed, which amount together with any amounts contributed by the employee shall constitute the consideration paid for the annuity contract in determining the amount of the annuity required to be included in the income of the employee under subsection 2 (b) (2) (A) of this title.

(3) Gifts, bequests, and devises: The value of property acquired by gift, devise, or inheritance (but the income from such property shall be included in gross income).

(4) Tax-free interest: Interest upon (a) the obligations of a State, Territory of the United States, or any political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia; and (b) obligations of the United States, its agencies, or instrumentalities.

(5) Compensation for injuries or sickness: Amounts received, through accident or health insurance or under workmen's compensation or employer's liability acts, or by way of damages for personal injuries, whether by suit or agreement.

(6) In the case of ministers: The rental value of a dwelling house and appurtenances thereof furnished to a minister of the gospel as part of his compensation.

(7) Income exempt under treaty: Income of any kind to the extent required by any treaty obligation of the United States.

(8) Income of foreign governments.

(9) Pensions to veterans: All amounts up to and including $2,000 paid during the taxable year to veterans under any law of the United States, or under any law of any State, Territory, or political subdivision thereof as benefits or pensions for disability arising out of injuries received during any period of war.

(10) Income from unincorporated business: In the case of any person entitled to a share in the net income of any unincorporated business subject to tax under the provisions of title VIII of this article, an amount equal to the proportionate share of such person in such part of such net income as is in excess of the exemption provided in section 4 of said title VIII: Provided, however, That such part so excluded from the gross income of such person shall be reported by and taxed against the unincorporated business under the provisions of title VIII of this article.

(11) Capital gains: Gains from the sale or exchange of any capital asset as defined in this article.

If the taxpayer's annual accounting period is other than a fiscal year as defined in section 4 (j) of title I or if the taxpayer has no annual accounting period or does not keep books, the net income shall be computed on the basis of the calendar year. If the taxpayer makes a Federal income-tax return, his income shall be computed, for the purposes of this title, on the basis of the same calendar or fiscal year as in such Federal income-tax return, if the basis is accepted and approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

SEC. 5. Inventories: Whenever in the opinion of the Assessor the use of inventories is necessary in order to properly determine the income of any taxpayer, inventories shall be taken by such taxpayer upon such basis as the Assessor may prescribe as conforming as nearly as may be to the best accounting practice in the trade or business and as most clearly reflecting the income.

SEC. 6. Assessor may reject method of accounting employed by taxpayer: Notwithstanding any other provisions of this article, the Assessor is hereby authorized to reject any return of income reported on a cash basis where, in his opinion, the net income of the taxpayer is not properly reflected and cannot be determined on such basis, and to require the return to be filed on such a basis as in his opinion will properly reflect the net income of the taxpayer.

(d) Information which may be disclosed: Nothing contained in section 4 (a) of this title shall be construed to prohibit the Assessor, in his discretion, from divulging or making known any information contained in, or relating to, any report, application, license, or return required under the provisions of this article other than such information

The assessor may require proof, satisfactory to him, of the payment of such income or intangible personal property taxes: Provided, however, That the credit provided for by this section shall not be allowed against any tax imposed under title VIII of this article.

SEC. 2. Imposition and rate of tax: For the privilege of carrying on or engaging in any trade or business within the District and of receiving income from sources within the District, there is hereby levied for each taxable year a tax at the rate of 5 percent upon the taxable income of every corporation, whether domestic or foreign (except those expressly exempt under title II of this article).

TITLE VIII—TAX ON UNINCORPORATED BUSINESSES

SEC. 1. Definition of unincorporated business: For the purposes of this article (not alone of this title) and unless otherwise required by the context, the words "unincorporated business" mean any trade or business, conducted or engaged in by any individual, whether resident or nonresident, statutory or common-law trust, estate, partnership, or limited or special partnership, society, association, executor, administrator, receiver, trustee, liquidator, conservator, committee, assignee, or by any other entity or fiduciary, other than a trade or business conducted or engaged in by any corporation; and include any trade or business which if conducted or engaged in by a corporation would be taxable under title VII of this article. The words "unincorporated business" do not include any trade or business which by law, customs, or ethics cannot be incorporated or any trade or business in which more than 80 percent of the gross income is derived from the personal services actually rendered by the individual or members of the partnership or other entity in the conducting or carrying on of any trade or business and in which capital is not a material income-producing factor.

SEC. 2. Taxable income defined: For the purposes of this title, and unless otherwise required by the context, the words "taxable income" mean the amount of net income derived from sources within the District within the meaning of title X of this article in excess of the exemption granted by section 4 of this title.

SEC. 3. Imposition and rate of tax: For the privilege of carrying on or engaging in any trade or business within the District and of receiving income from sources within the District, there is hereby levied for each taxable year a tax at the rate of 5 percent upon the taxable income of every unincorporated business, whether domestic or foreign (except those expressly exempt under title II of this article).

SEC. 4. SEC. 5. By whom payable: The taxes imposed by section 3 of this title shall be payable by the person or persons, jointly and severally, conducting the unincorporated business. The taxes imposed under this title may be assessed in the name of the unincorporated business or in the name or names of the person or persons liable for the payment of such taxes, or both.

SEC. 6. Partners only taxable: Individuals carrying on any trade or business in partnership in the District, other than an unincorporated business, shall be liable for income tax only in their individual capacities. The tax on all such income shall be assessed against the individual partners under title VI of this article. There shall be included in computing the net income of each partner his distributive share, whether distributed or not, of the net income of the partnership for the taxable year; or if his net income for such taxable year is computed upon the basis of a period different from that upon the basis of which the net income of the partnership is computed, then his distributive share of the net income of the partnership for any accounting period of the partnership ending within the taxable year upon the basis of which the partner's net income is computed.

TITLE IX—TAX ON ESTATES AND TRUSTS

SEC. 1. Resident and nonresident estates and trusts: For the purposes of this title, estates and trusts are (a) resident estates or trusts, or (b) nonresident estates or trusts. If the decedent was not at the time of his death domiciled within the District, his estate is a nonresident estate, and any trust created by his will is a nonresident trust. If the creator of a trust was at the time the trust was created domiciled within the District, or if the trust consists of property of a person domiciled within the District, the trust is a resident trust. If the creator of the trust was not at the time the trust was created domiciled within the District, the trust is a nonresident trust. If the trust resulted from the dissolution of a corporation organized under the laws of the District of Columbia the trust is a resident trust. If the trust resulted from the dissolution of a foreign corporation, the trust is a nonresident trust.

SEC. 2. Residence or situs of fiduciary not to control: The residence or situs of the fiduciary shall not control the classification of estates and trusts as resident or nonresident under the provisions of section 1 of this title.

(a) income accumulated in trust for the benefit of unborn or unascertained person or persons with contingent interests, and income accumulated or held for future distribution under the terms of the will or trust;

(b) income which is to be distributed currently by the fiduciary to the beneficiaries, and income collected by a guardian of any infant or incompetent person which is to be held or distributed as the court may direct;

(c) income received by estates of deceased persons during the period of administration or settlement of the estate; and

(d) income which, in the discretion of the fiduciary, may be either distributed to the beneficiaries or accumulated.

SEC. 5. Net income: The net income of the estate or trust shall be computed in the same manner and on the same basis as in the case of an individual, except as to the personal exemptions and credits for dependents, and except that—

(a) there shall be allowed as an additional deduction in computing the net income of the estate or trust the amount of the income of the estate or trust for its taxable year which is to be distributed currently by the fiduciary to the beneficiaries, and the amount of the income collected by a guardian of an infant which is to be held or distributed as the court may direct, but the amount so allowed as a deduction shall be included in computing the net income of the beneficiaries whether distributed to them or not. Any amount allowed as a deduction under this paragraph shall not be allowed as a deduction under subsection (b) of this section in the same or any succeeding taxable year;

(b) in the case of income received by estates of deceased persons during the period of administration or settlement of the estate, and in the case of income which, in the discretion of the fiduciary, may be either distributed to the beneficiary or accumulated, there shall be allowed as an additional deduction in computing the net income of the estate or trust the amount of the income of the estate or trust for its taxable year, which is properly paid or credited during such year to any legatee, heir, or beneficiary, but the amount so allowed as a deduction shall be included in computing the net income of the legatee, heir, or beneficiary;

(c) there shall be allowed as a deduction (in lieu of the deductions for charitable contributions authorized by title III, section 3 (a) (8), of this article) any part of the gross income, without limitation, which pursuant to the terms of the will or deed creating a trust, is during the taxable year paid or permanently set aside for the purposes and in the manner provided in title III, section 3 (a) (8), of this article or is to be used exclusively for the purposes enumerated in title III, section 3 (a) (8), of this article.

SEC. 6. Different taxable year: If the taxable year of a beneficiary is different from that of the estate or trust, the amount which he is required, under section 5 (a) of this title, to include in computing his net income, shall be based upon the income of the estate or trust for any taxable year of the estate or trust ending within his taxable year.

SEC. 7. Revocable trusts: The income of a trust shall be included in computing the net income of the grantor of such trust where at any time the power to revest in the grantor title to any part of the corpus of the trust is vested—

(a) in the grantor, either alone or in conjunction with any person not having a substantial adverse interest in the disposition of such part of the corpus or the income therefrom; or

(b) in any person not having a substantial adverse interest in the disposition of such part of the corpus or the income therefrom.

SEC. 8. Income for benefit of grantor: So much of the income of any trust shall be included in computing the net income of the grantor as—

(a) is, or in the discretion of the grantor or of any person not having a substantial adverse interest in the disposition of such part of the income may be, held or accumulated for future distribution to the grantor; or

(b) may, in the discretion of the grantor or of any person not having a substantial adverse interest in the disposition of such part of the income, be distributed to the grantor; or

(c) is, or in the discretion of the grantor or of any person not having a substantial adverse interest in the disposition of such part of the income may be, applied to the payment of premiums upon policies of insurance on the life of the grantor (except policies of insurance irrevocably payable for the purposes and in the manner specified in title III, section 3 (a) (8), relating to the so-called charitable contribution deduction).

SEC. 9. Definition of "in discretion of grantor": As used in this title, the term "in the discretion of the grantor" means in the discretion of the grantor either alone or in conjunction with any person not having a substantial adverse interest in the disposition of the part of the income in question.

SEC. 10. Employees' trusts: (a) exemption from tax: A trust forming part of a stock bonus, pension, or profit-sharing plan of an employer for the exclusive benefit of his employees or their beneficiaries shall not be taxable under this article and no other provision of this article shall apply with respect to such trust or to its beneficiary, except as hereinafter in this section expressly provided, if such trust meets the requirements for exemption from Federal income tax under section 165 of the Federal Internal Revenue Code.

(b) Taxability of beneficiary: The amount actually distributed or made available to any distributee by any such trust shall be taxable to him, in the year in which so distributed or made available, under section 2 (b) (2) of title III of this article as if it were an annuity the consideration for which is the amount contributed by the employee.

(c) Treatment of beneficiary of trust not exempt under subsection (a): Contributions to a trust made by an employer during a taxable year of the employer which ends within or with a taxable year of the trust for which the trust is not exempt under subsection (a) of this section shall be included in the gross income of an employee for the taxable year in which the contribution is made to the trust in the case of an employee whose beneficial interest in such contribution is nonforfeitable at the time the contribution is made.

TITLE X—PURPOSE OF ARTICLE AND ALLOCATION AND APPORTIONMENT

SEC. 1. Purpose of article: It is the purpose of this article to impose (1) an income tax upon the entire net income of every resident and every resident estate and trust, and (2) a franchise tax upon every corporation and unincorporated business for the privilege of carrying on or engaging in any trade or business within the District and of receiving such other income as is derived from sources within the District: Provided, however, That, in the case of any corporation, the amount received as dividends from a corporation which is subject to taxation under this article, and, in the case of a corporation not engaged in carrying on any trade or business within the District, interest received by it from a corporation which is subject to taxation under this article shall not be considered as income from sources within the District for the purposes of this article. The measure of the franchise tax shall be that portion of the net income of the corporation and unincorporated business as is fairly attributable to any trade or business carried on or engaged in within the District and such other net income as is derived from sources within the District.

SEC. 2. Allocation and apportionment: The entire net income of any corporation or unincorporated business, derived from any trade or business carried on or engaged in wholly within the District shall, for the purposes of this article, be deemed to be from sources within the District, and shall, along with other income from sources within the District, be allocated to the District. If the trade or business of any corporation or unincorporated business is carried on or engaged in both within and without the District, the net income derived therefrom shall, for the purposes of this article, be deemed to be income from sources within and without the District. Where the net income of a corporation or unincorporated business is derived from sources both within and without the District, the portion thereof subject to tax under this article shall be determined under regulation or regulations prescribed by the Commissioners. The Assessor is authorized to employ any formula or formulas provided in any regulation or regulations prescribed by the Commissioners under this article which, in his opinion, should be applied in order to properly determine the net income of any corporation or unincorporated business subject to tax under this article.

SEC. 3. Allocation of income and deductions between organizations, and so forth: In any of two or more organizations, trades, or businesses (whether or not incorporated, whether or not organized in the District, and whether or not affiliated) owned or controlled directly or indirectly by the same interests, the Assessor is authorized to distribute, apportion, or allocate gross income or deductions between or among such organizations, trades, or businesses, whenever in his opinion such distribution, apportionment, or allocation is necessary in order to prevent evasion of taxes or clearly to reflect the income of any of such organizations, trades, or businesses. The provisions of this section shall apply, but shall not be limited in application to any case of a common carrier by railroad subject to the Interstate Commerce Act and jointly owned or controlled directly or indirectly by two or more common carriers by railroad subject to said act.

TITLE XI—BASES

SEC. 1. Basis for determining gain or loss: The basis for determining the gain or loss from the sale, exchange, or other disposition of property shall be the cost of such property, except that—

(a) If the property is of a kind which would properly be included in the inventory of the taxpayer if on hand at the close of the taxable year, the basis shall be the last inventory value thereof.

(b) In respect of any real or tangible property acquired after December 31, 1938, the cost thereof shall be adjusted as follows:

(1) By adding to its original cost to the taxpayer the amount of all expenditures connected therewith, including real-estate taxes upon the property, which were properly chargeable to capital account and were not deducted in any income-tax return which the taxpayer was required to file under the provisions of this article or the District of Columbia Income Tax Act of 1939, as amended; but such additions as are herein provided for shall include only those expenditures made by the taxpayer between the time the property was acquired by him and the date of sale or other disposition of the property.

(2) By deducting from such cost the full loss sustained since acquisition for exhaustion, wear and tear, obsolescence, amortization, and depletion to the extent allowed or allowable (whichever amount is the greater) on such property in all returns required to be filed by the taxpayer under the provisions of this article or of the District of Columbia Income Tax Act of 1939, as amended.

(3) In the case of property (including intangible personal property) acquired by gift or inheritance, where the transfer thereof to the taxpayer was subject to tax by the United States or by any jurisdiction in which the property had a taxable situs at that time, the basis of the property so acquired shall be the highest valuation then placed upon such transfer by the United States or by any authorized taxing State or Territory thereof. If such transfer of the property was not subject to the aforesaid transfer tax, the base shall be the fair market value of such property at the time acquired. For the purpose of this subsection, the time such inherited property was acquired shall be the date of death of the decedent. The basis herein provided for shall be subject to the appropriate adjustment or adjustments defined in section 1 (b) of this title.

(c) If the property was acquired before January 1, 1939, the basis shall be the fair market value as of that date, or, at the option of the taxpayer, the cost of such property, and in the case of real or tangible property such cost shall be diminished by exhaustion, wear and tear, obsolescence, and depletion actually sustained before such date: Provided, however, That the preceding valuation so determined shall be adjusted by the appropriate additions and deductions provided for in section 1 (b) of this title to cover the period from January 1, 1939, to the date of sale or other disposition of the property.

SEC. 2. (a) Computation of gain or loss: The gain or loss, as the case may be, from the sale or other disposition of property shall be the difference between (a) the amount realized from such sale or other disposition of the property and (b) the basis as defined in section 1 of this title.

(b) Amount realized: The amount realized from the sale or exchange of property shall be its selling price, and such price shall include cash payments received or to be received subsequently therefor, plus the sum of any mortgage and other encumbrances thereon at the time of such sale or exchange. The amount realized shall also include at its then market value any property received in part or in full settlement of the property sold or exchanged, adjusted to include the then existing encumbrances on such property received in exchange.

SEC. 3. Exchange in reorganizations: When in connection with the reorganization of a corporation, a taxpayer receives, in place of stock or securities owned by him, any stock or securities of the reorganized corporation, no gain or loss shall be deemed to occur from the exchange until the new stock or securities are sold or realized upon and the gain or loss is definitely ascertained, until which time the new stock or securities received shall be treated as taking the place of the stock and securities exchanged. For the purposes of this section, the word "reorganization" means (1) a statutory merger or consolidation; or (2) the acquisition by one corporation, in exchange solely for all or a part of its voting stock, of at least 80 percent of the voting stock and at least 80 percent of the total number of shares of all other classes of stock of another corporation; or (3) the acquisition by one corporation, in exchange solely for all or a part of its voting stock, of substantially all the properties of another corporation, but in determining whether the exchange is solely for voting stock the assumption by the acquiring corporation of a liability of the other, or the fact that property acquired is subject to a liability, shall be disregarded; or (4) a transfer by a corporation of all or a part of its assets to another corporation if immediately after the transfer the transferor or its shareholders, or both, are in control of the corporation to which the assets are transferred; or (5) a recapitalization; or (6) a mere change in identity, form, or place of organization, however effected.

SEC. 4. Basis for dividends paid in property: Where any property other than money is paid by a corporation as a dividend, the base to the recipient thereof shall be the market value of such property at the time of its distribution by such corporation.

SEC. 5. The provisions of sections 1 through 3 of this title shall not apply to the sale or exchange of any property defined as a capital asset by section 4 (1) of title I of this article.

SEC. 6. Depreciation: The bases used in determining the amount allowable as a deduction from gross income under the provisions of section 3 (a) (7) of title III of this article shall be—

(a) where the property was acquired after December 31, 1938, by purchase, the basis shall be the cost thereof to the taxpayer;

(b) where the property was received in exchange for other property after December 31, 1938, the basis shall be the market value thereof at the time of such exchange;

(c) where the property was inherited or acquired by gift after December 31, 1938, the basis shall be that defined in subsection 1 (b) (3) of this title;

(d) if the property was acquired prior to January 1, 1939, the appropriate basis set forth in subsection (a), (b), or (c) of this section shall be used: Provided, however, That the taxpayer may, at his option, use as the basis the market value of such property as of January 1, 1939;

(e) the taxpayer may deduct in each taxable year only such amount of depreciation as was actually sustained during that year and such annual deduction shall be based upon the useful life of the property remaining after the date used by the taxpayer in establishing the valuation: Provided, however, That the allowance for depreciation actually sustained during any taxable year may not be increased by any depreciation of the property which was allowable as a deduction in any earlier taxable year: And provided further, That any basis so established may not be changed in a subsequent taxable year, unless written approval of the Assessor has been first obtained.

TITLE XII—ASSESSMENT AND COLLECTION; TIME OF PAYMENT

SEC. 1. Duties of Assessor: The Assessor is hereby required to administer the provisions of this article. As soon as practicable after the return is filed the Assessor shall examine it and shall determine the correct amount of tax.

SEC. 2. Statements and special returns: Every person upon whom the duty is imposed by this article to file any applications, returns, or reports or who is liable for any tax imposed by this article shall keep such records, render under oath such statements, and comply with such rules and regulations as the Assessor from time to time may prescribe. Whenever the Assessor deems it necessary he may require any person, by notice served upon him, to make a return, render under oath such statements, or keep such records as he believes sufficient to show whether or not such person is liable to tax under this article and the extent of such liability.

SEC. 3. Examination of books and witnesses: The Assessor, for the purpose of ascertaining the correctness of any return filed hereunder, or for the purpose of making an estimate of the taxable income of any taxpayer, is authorized to examine any books, papers, records, or memoranda of any person bearing upon the matters required to be included in the return and may summon any person to appear and produce books, records, papers, or memoranda bearing upon the matters required to be included in the return, and to give testimony or answer interrogatories under oath respecting the same, and the Assessor shall have power to administer oaths to such person or persons. Such summons may be served by any member of the Metropolitan Police Department. If any person having been personally summoned shall neglect or refuse to obey the summons issued as herein provided, then, and in that event, the Assessor may report that fact to the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, or one of the justices thereof, and said court or any justice thereof hereby is empowered to compel obedience to such summons to the same extent as witnesses may be compelled to obey the subpenas of that court. Any person in custody or control of any books, papers, records, or memoranda bearing upon the matters required to be included in such returns, who shall refuse to permit the examination by the Assessor or any person designated by him of any such books, papers, records, or memoranda, or who shall obstruct or hinder the Assessor or any person designated by him in the examination of any books, papers, records, or memoranda, shall upon conviction thereof be fined not more than $300. All prosecutions under this section shall be brought in the municipal court of the District of Columbia on information by the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia or any of his assistants in the name of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 4. Return by Assessor: If any person fails to make and file a return at the time prescribed by law or by regulations made under authority of law, or makes, willfully or otherwise, a false or fraudulent return, the Assessor shall make the return from his own knowledge and from such information as he can obtain through testimony or otherwise. Any return so made and subscribed by the Assessor shall be prima facie good and sufficient for all legal purposes.

SEC. 5. Determination and assessment of deficiency: If a deficiency in tax is determined by the Assessor, the taxpayer shall be notified thereof and given a period of not less than 30 days, after such notice is sent by registered mail, in which to file a protest and show cause or reason why the deficiency should not be paid. Opportunity for hearing shall be granted by the Assessor, and a final decision thereon shall be made as quickly as practicable.

SEC 6. Jeopardy assessment: (a) Authority for making: If the Assessor believes that the collection of any tax imposed by this article will be jeopardized by delay, he shall, whether or not the time otherwise prescribed by law for making return and paying such tax has expired, immediately assess such tax (together with all interest and penalties, the assessment of which is provided for by law). Such tax, penalties, and interest shall thereupon become immediately due and payable, and immediate notice and demand shall be made by the Collector for the payment thereof. Upon failure or refusal to pay such tax, penalty, and interest, collection thereof by distraint shall be lawful.

(b) Bond to stay collection: The collection of the whole or any part of the amount of such assessment may be stayed by filing with the Collector a bond in such amount, not exceeding double the amount as to which the stay is desired, and with such sureties as the Collector deems necessary, conditioned upon the payment of the amount the collection of which is stayed, at the time at which, but for this section, such amount would be due.

SEC. 7. (a) Time of payment: One-half of the total amount of the tax due as shown on the taxpayer's return shall be paid to the Collector on the 15th day of April following the close of the calendar year and the remaining one-half of such tax shall be paid to the Collector on the 15th day of October following the close of the calendar year, or, if the return be made on the basis of a fiscal year, then one-half of the total amount of such tax shall be paid on the 15th day of the fourth month following the close of the fiscal year and the remaining one-half of such tax shall be paid on the 15th day of the tenth month following the close of the fiscal year. Any deficiency in tax determined by the Assessor under the provisions of section 5 of this title shall be due and payable within 10 days from the date of the assessment.

(b) Extension of time for payments: At the request of the taxpayer the Assessor may extend the time for payment by the taxpayer of the amount determined as the tax for a period not to exceed 6 months from the date prescribed for the payment of the tax or an installment thereof: Provided, however, That where the time for filing a return is extended for a period exceeding 6 months under the provisions of title V, section 3 (b), the Assessor may extend the time for payment of the tax, or the first installment thereof, to the same date to which he has extended the time for filing the return. In such case the amount in respect to which the extension is granted shall be paid on or before the date of the expiration of the period of the extension.

(c) Voluntary advance payment: A tax imposed by this article, or any installment thereof, may be paid, at the election of the taxpayer, prior to the date prescribed for its payment.

SEC. 8. Withholding of tax at source: Whenever the Assessor shall deem it necessary in order to satisfy the District's claim for a tax payable by any foreign corporation or unincorporated business, he may, by rules and regulations, require any person subject to the jurisdiction of the District to withhold and pay to the Collector an amount not in excess of 5 percent of all income payable by such person to such foreign corporation or unincorporated business. After such foreign corporation or unincorporated business shall have filed all returns required under this title, and the same shall have been audited, the Collector shall refund any overpayment to the taxpayer.

SEC. 9. Tax a personal debt: Every tax imposed by this article, and all increases, interest, and penalties thereof, shall become, from the time it is due and payable, a personal debt, from the person or persons liable to pay the same to the District and shall be entitled to the same priority as other District taxes, and the taxes levied under this article and the interest and penalties thereon shall be collected by the Collector in the manner provided by law for the collection of taxes due the District on personal property in force at the time of such collection.

SEC. 10. Period of limitation upon assessment and collection. (a) General rule: Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section—

(1) the amount of income taxes imposed by this article shall be assessed within 3 years after the return is filed, and no proceeding in court without assessment for the collection of such taxes shall be begun after the expiration of such period;

(2) in the case of income received during the lifetime of a decedent, or by his estate during the period of administration, or by a corporation, the tax shall be assessed, and any proceeding in court without assessment for the collection of such tax shall be begun within 12 months after written request therefor (filed after the return is made) by the executor, administrator, or other fiduciary representing the estate of such decedent, or by the corporation, but not after the expiration of 3 years after the return is filed. This subsection shall not apply in the case of a corporation unless—

(A) such written request notifies the Assessor that the corporation contemplates dissolution at or before the expiration of such 12-month period; and

(B) the dissolution is in good faith begun before the expiration of such 12-month period; and

(C) the dissolution is completed;

(3) if the taxpayer omits from gross income an amount properly includible therein which is in excess of 25 percent of the amount of gross income stated in the return, the tax may be assessed, or a proceeding in court for the collection of such tax may be begun without assessment, at any time within 5 years after the return was filed;

(4) for the purposes of subsections (a) (1), (a) (2), and (a) (3), a return filed before the last day prescribed by law for the filing thereof shall be considered as filed on such last day: Provided, however, That the periods of limitations upon the assessment and collection of taxes provided in this section in cases where the taxpayer has appealed to the Board of Tax Appeals as provided in this article shall be suspended until such cases have been finally disposed of in the Board of Tax Appeals by final decision, dismissal, or otherwise.

(b) False return: In the case of a false or fraudulent return with intent to evade tax or of a failure to file a return, the tax may be assessed, or a proceeding in court for the collection of such tax may be begun without assessment, at any time.

(c) Waiver: Where before the expiration of the time prescribed in subsection (a) for the assessment of the tax, both the assessor and the taxpayer have consented in writing to its assessment after such time, the tax may be assessed at any time prior to the expiration of the period agreed upon. The period so agreed upon may be extended by subsequent agreements in writing made before the expiration of the period previously agreed upon.

(d) Collection after assessment: Where the assessment of any income tax imposed by this article has been made within the period of limitation properly applicable thereto, such tax may be collected by distraint or by a proceeding in court, but only if begun (1) within 3 years after the assessment of the tax or (2) prior to the expiration of any period for collection agreed upon in writing by the assessor and the taxpayer before the expiration of such 3-year period. The period so agreed upon may be extended by subsequent agreements in writing made before the expiration of the period previously agreed upon.

SEC. 11. Refunds: Except as to any deficiency taxes assessed under the provisions of section 5 of this title, where there has been an overpayment of any tax imposed by this article, the amount of such overpayment shall be credited against any income tax or installment thereof, whether such tax was assessed as a deficiency or otherwise, then due from the taxpayer, and the balance shall be refunded to the taxpayer. No such credit or refund shall be allowed after 3 years from the time the tax was paid unless before the expiration of such period a claim therefor is filed by the taxpayer, and no tax or part thereof which the assessor may determine to have been an overpayment shall be refunded after the period prescribed therefor in the act appropriating the funds from which such refund would otherwise be made. The amount of such credit or refund shall not exceed the portion of the tax paid during the 3 years immediately preceding the filing of the claim, or if no claim was filed, then during the 3 years immediately preceding the allowance of such credit or refund. Every claim for credit or refund must be in writing, under oath; must state the specific grounds upon which the claim is founded, and must be filed with the assessor: Provided, That if it shall be determined by the assessor, the Board of Tax Appeals for the District of Columbia, or any court that any part of any tax which was assessed as a deficiency under the provisions of section 5 of this title was an overpayment, interest shall be allowed and paid upon such overpayment at the rate of 4 percent per annum from the date such overpayments were paid until the date of refund.

SEC. 12. Closing agreements: The Assessor is authorized to enter into a written agreement with any person relating to the liability of such person (or of the person or estate for whom he acts) in respect of any income tax for any period ending prior to the date of the agreement. If such agreement is approved by the Commissioners within such time as may be stated in such agreement, or later agreed to, such agreement shall be final and conclusive and except upon a showing of fraud or malfeasance, or misrepresentation of a material fact—the case shall not be reopened as to the matters agreed upon or the agreement modified; and in any suit or proceeding relating to the tax liability of the taxpayer such agreement shall not be annulled, modified, set aside, or disregarded.

SEC. 13. Compromises: (a) Authority to make.—Whenever in the opinion of the Commissioners there shall arise with respect of any tax imposed under this article any doubt as to the liability of the taxpayer or the collectibility of the tax for any reason whatsoever, the Commissioners may compromise such tax.

(b) Concealment of assets: Any person who, in connection with any compromise under this section or offer of such compromise or in connection with any closing agreement under this title or offer to enter into any such agreement, willfully (1) conceals from any officer or employee of the District of Columbia any property belonging to the estate of the taxpayer or other person liable with respect of the tax, or (2) receives, destroys, mutilates, or falsifies any book, document, or record or makes under oath any false statement relating to the estate or the financial condition of the taxpayer or to the person liable in respect of the tax, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than 1 year, or both. All prosecutions under this section shall be brought in the municipal court of the District of Columbia on information by the Corporation Counsel of the District of Columbia or any of his assistants in the name of the District of Columbia.

(c) Of penalties and interest: The Commissioners shall have the power for cause shown to compromise any penalty which may be imposed by the Assessor under the provisions of this article. The Assessor may adjust any interest where, in his opinion, the facts in the case warrant such action.

SEC. 14. Definition of "person": The term "person" as used in this title includes an officer or employee of a corporation, or a member or employee of a partnership, who as such officer, employee, or member is under duty to perform the act in respect to which the violation occurs.

SEC. 15. Payment to Collector and receipts: The taxes provided under this article shall be collected by the Collector and the revenues derived therefrom shall be turned over to the Treasury of the United States for credit to the District in the same manner as other revenues are turned over to the United States Treasury for credit to the District. The Collector shall, upon written request, give to the person making payment of any income tax a full written or printed receipt therefor.

TITLE XIII—PENALTIES AND INTEREST

SEC. 1. Failure to file return: In case of any failure to make and file a return required by this article, within the time prescribed by law or prescribed by the Commissioners or Assessor in pursuance of law, 5 percent of the tax shall be added to the tax for each month or fraction thereof that such failure continues, not to exceed 25 percent in the aggregate, except that when a return is filed after such time and it is shown that the failure to file it was due to reasonable cause and not due to willful neglect, no such addition shall be made to the tax. The amount so added to any tax shall be collected at the same time and in the same manner and as a part of the tax unless the tax has been paid before the discovery of the neglect, in which case the amount so added shall be assessed and collected.

SEC. 2. Interest on deficiencies: (a) Interest upon the amount determined as a deficiency shall be assessed at the same time as the deficiency, shall be paid upon notice and demand from the Collector, and shall be collected as a part of the tax, at the rate of 6 percent per annum from the date prescribed for the payment of the tax (or, if the tax is paid in installments, from the date prescribed for the payment of the first installment) to the date the deficiency is assessed.

(b) If extension granted for payment of deficiency: If the time for payment of any part of a deficiency is extended, there shall be collected, as a part of the tax, interest on the part of the deficiency the time for payment of which is so extended at the rate of 6 percent per annum for the period of the extension. If a part of the deficiency the time for payment of which is so extended is not paid in full, together with all penalties and interest due thereon, prior to the expiration of the period of the extension, then interest at the rate of 6 percent per annum shall be added and collected on such unpaid amount from the date of the expiration of the period of the extension until it is paid.

SEC. 3. Additions to the tax in case of deficiency: (a) Neglignece: If any part of any deficiency is due to negligence, or intentional disregard of rules and regulations but without intent to defraud, 5 percent of the total amount of the deficiency (in addition to such deficiency) shall be assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as if it were a deficiency.

(b) Fraud: If any part of any deficiency is due to fraud with intent to evade tax, then 50 percent of the total amount of the deficiency (in addition to such deficiency) shall be so assessed, collected, and paid.

SEC. 4. Additions to the tax in case of nonpayment: (a) Tax shown on return: (1) General rule: Where the amount determined by the taxpayer as the tax imposed by this article, or any installment thereof, or any part of such amount or installment, is not paid on or before the date prescribed for its payment, there shall be collected as a part of the tax interest upon such unpaid amount at the rate of 6 percent per annum from the date prescribed for its payment until it is paid.

(2) If extension granted: Where an extension of time for payment of the amount so determined as the tax by the taxpayer, or any installment thereof has been granted, and the amount the time for payment of which has been extended, and the interest thereon determined under section 5 of this title is not paid in full prior to the expiration of the period of the extension, then, in lieu of the interest provided for in subsection (a) (1) of this section, interest at the rate of 6 percent per annum shall be collected on such unpaid amount from the date of the expiration of the period of the extension until it is paid.

(b) Deficiency: Where a deficiency, or any interest or additional amounts assessed in connection therewith under section 2 or under section 3, or any addition to the tax in case of delinquency provided for in section 1 is not paid in full within 10 days from the date of assessment thereof, there shall be collected, as part of the tax, interest, upon the unpaid amount at the rate of 6 percent per annum from the date of such notice and demand until it is paid.

SEC. 5. Time extended for payment of tax shown on return: If the time for payment of the amount determined as the tax by the taxpayer, or any installment thereof, is extended under the authority of title XII, section 7 (b), there shall be collected, as a part of such amount, interest thereon at the rate of 6 percent per annum from the date when such payment should have been made if no extension had been granted, until the expiration of the period of the extension.

SEC. 6. Penalties: (a) Willful violation: Any person required under this article to pay or collect any tax, or required by law or regulations made under authority thereof to make a return, keep any records, or supply any information, for the purposes of this article, who willfully refuses to pay or collect such tax, to make such return, to keep such records, or to supply such information, or who makes a false or fraudulent return, or who willfully attempts in any manner to defeat or evade the tax imposed by this act, shall, in addition to other penalties provided by law, be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than 1 year, or both, together with costs of prosecution. All prosecutions under this section shall be brought in the municipal court of the District of Columbia on information by the Corporation Counsel or one of his assistants in the name of the District.

(b) Definition of "person": The term "person" as used in this title includes an officer or employee of a corporation, or a member or employee of a partnership, who as such officer, employee, or member is under duty to perform the act in respect to which the violation occurs.

TITLE XIV—LICENSES

SEC. 1. Requirement: No corporation or unincorporated business, except such corporations or unincorporated business as are expressly exempt under the provisions of title II of this article, shall engage in or carry on any trade or business in the District without a license so to do issued under this article in addition to all other licenses and permits required by law, except as hereinafter provided. For the first calendar year to which this article is applicable, no license shall be required of any corporation licensed under the provisions of the act of July 26, 1939, as amended. Every corporation not so licensed and every unincorporated business shall obtain such license within 60 days after the approval of this act. Every corporation or unincorporated business which commences to engage in or carry on any trade or business in the District after the passage of this act shall obtain a license under this article within 60 days after the date of the commencement of such trade or business in the District. Applications for licenses shall be filed with the Assessor prior to January 1 of each year upon forms prescribed and furnished by the Assessor, and each application shall be accompanied by a fee of $10.

SEC. 2. Duration of license: All licenses issued under this title shall be in effect for the duration of the calendar year for which issued, unless revoked as provided in this title, and shall expire at midnight on the 31st day of December of each year. No license may be transferred to any other corporation or unincorporated business.

SEC. 3. Licenses to be posted: All licenses granted under this title to corporations or unincorporated businesses having an office or place of business in the District must be conspicuously posted in the office or on the premises of the licensee, and said license shall be accessible at all times for inspection by the police or other officers duly authorized to make such inspection.

SEC. 4. Where a corporation or unincorporated business has no office or place or business in the District, agent or employee shall carry certificate or license: Every corporation and every unincorporated business not having an office or place of business in the District which engages in or carries on any trade or business in the District by or through an employee or agent shall procure the license provided by this title. Every employee or agent of any such corporation or unincorporated business shall carry either the license or a certificate from the Assessor that the license has been obtained, which license or certificate shall be exhibited to the police or other officers duly authorized to inspect the same. Such certificate shall be in such form as the Assessor shall determine, and shall be furnished, without charge, by the Assessor, upon request. No employee or agent of the corporation not having an office or place of business in the District shall engage in or carry on any trade or business in the District for or on behalf of such corporation or unincorporated business unless such corporation or unincorporated business shall have first obtained a license, as provided by this title.

SEC. 5. Revocation: The Commissioners may, after hearing, revoke any license issued hereunder for failure of the licensee to file a return or corrected return within the time required by this article, or to pay any installment of tax when due.

SEC. 6. Renewal: Licenses shall be renewed for the ensuing calendar year upon application as provided in section 1 of this title. No license shall be issued or renewed if the taxpayer has failed or refused to pay any tax or installment thereof, or penalties or interest thereon, imposed by this article: Provided, however, That the Commissioners, in their discretion, for cause shown, may, on such terms or conditions as they may determine or prescribe, waive the provisions of this section.

SEC. 7. Penalty for failure to obtain license: Any corporation or unincorporated business engaged in or carrying on any trade or business in the District or receiving income from sources within the District within the meaning of title X of this article without having obtained a license so to do, within the time prescribed by section 1 of this title, and any person engaging in or carrying on any trade or business in the District or receiving income from sources within the District within the meaning of title X of this article for or on behalf of any corporation or unincorporated business not having a license so to do, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $300 for each and every failure, refusal, or violation, and each and every day that such failure, refusal, or violation continues shall constitute a separate and distinct offense. All prosecutions under this section shall be brought in the municipal court of the District of Columbia on information by the Corporation Counsel or any of his assistants in the name of the District: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to mere collection by an agent of income of a corporation or unincorporated business not having the license required under this title.

TITLE XV—APPEAL

SEC. 1. Appeal to board of tax appeals for the District of Columbia: Any person aggrieved by any assessment of a deficiency in tax determined and assessed by the Assessor under the provisions of title XII, section 5, of this article and any persons aggrieved by the denial of any claim for refund made under the provisions of title XII, section 11 of this article, may, within 90 days from the date of the assessment of the deficiency or from the date of the denial of a claim for refund, as the case may be, appeal to the Board of Tax Appeals for the District of Columbia, in the same manner and to the same extent set forth in sections 3, 4, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12 of title IX of the Act entitled "An Act to amend the District of Columbia Revenue Act of 1937, and for other purposes", approved May 16, 1938, and as the same may hereafter be amended.

SEC. 2. Election of remedy: The remedy provided in section 1 of this title shall not be deemed to take away from the taxpayer any remedy which he might have under any other provision of law, but no suit by the taxpayer for the recovery of any part of any tax shall be instituted in any court if the taxpayer has elected to file an appeal with respect to such tax in accordance with the provisions of section 1 of this title.

TITLE XVI—RULES AND REGULATIONS

SEC. 1. The Commissioners shall prescribe and publish such rules and regulations consistent with the provisions of this article, as may be necessary and proper for its enforcement and efficient administration.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any amendments?

The Chair is advised that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE] has an amendment on the desk.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that none of us believed that we would jump to page 84 so rapidly, I ask unanimous consent that when the gentleman from Texas returns to the Chamber he be permitted to offer his amendment, if he so desires.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"(a) Two percent upon the amount of the receipts from every sale of tangible personal property sold at retail, including services rendered in connection therewith, except those exempted in section 3 of this title.

"SEC. 3. Exemptions: (a) Receipts from sales of the following and services rendered in connection therewith shall be exempt from the taxes imposed by this title:

"(1) Motor-vehicle fuels upon the sale of which a tax is imposed by the act entitled "An act to provide for a tax on motor-vehicle fuels sold within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes", approved April 23, 1924, as amended or as may be hereafter amended; gas, electricity, telephone and telegraph service, and any other commodity or service sold or furnished by a public utility corporation, and cigarettes, if such sales are taxed by some other provision of law in force in the District during or for the period of time covered by any return required to be filed by the provisions of this title.

"(2) By or to the United States or the District or any instrumentality thereof.

"(3) Whisky, wines, liquors, beer, and other alcoholic beverages and drinks compounded thereof or therewith sold for consumption off or on the premises, upon which a beverage tax is levied during or for any period

"(b) The Commissioners are authorized to exempt from the taxes imposed by this title any or all sales, the consideration of which amounts to 50 cents or less.

"SEC. 4. Upon each taxable sale or service the tax to be collected shall be stated and charged separately from the sale price or charge for service and shown separately on any record thereof, at the time when the sale is made or evidence of sale issued or employed by the vendor and shall be paid by the purchaser to the vendor as trustee for and on account of the District, and the vendor shall be liable for the collection thereof and for the tax. The vendor and any officer of any corporate vendor shall be personally liable for the tax collected or required to be collected under this title, and the vendor shall have the same right in respect to collecting the tax from the purchaser, or in respect to nonpayment of the tax by the purchaser, as if the tax were a part of the purchase price of the property or service and payable at the time of the sale: Provided, however, That the Collector shall be joined as a party plaintiff in any action or proceeding brought by the vendor to collect the tax.

"SEC. 5. The tax imposed by this title shall be paid upon all sales made and services rendered beginning 60 days after approval of this act but not prior to July 1, 1947, although made or rendered under a contract dated prior thereto. Where a service is billed on either a monthly or other term basis, the payment of such bill for such month or other period of time shall be a receipt subject to the tax herein imposed. The Commissioners may provide by regulation that the tax upon receipts from sales on the installment plan may be paid in full at the time the agreement therefor is made or on the account of each installment and upon the date when such installment is due. The Commissioners may provide by regulation for the exclusion of amounts representing sales where the contract of sales has been canceled, or the property returned, or the receipt has been ascertained to be worthless or, in case the tax has been paid upon such receipt, for a credit or refund of the amount of the tax upon such receipt upon application therefor as provided in section 13 of this title.

"SEC. 6 Presumptions For the purpose of the proper administration of this title and to prevent evasion of the tax hereby imposed, it shall be presumed that all receipts for property and services mentioned in this title are subject to tax until the contrary is established, and the burden of proving that a receipt is not taxable hereunder shall be upon the vendor or the purchaser. Unless the vendor shall have taken from the purchaser a certificate signed by and bearing the name and address of the purchaser and the number of his registration certificate to the effect that the property or service was purchased for resale, the sale shall be deemed to be a taxable sale at retail.

"SEC. 7. No person engaged in the business of selling property or services the receipts from which are subject to tax under this title shall advertise or hold out to the public in any manner directly or indirectly that the tax imposed by this title is not considered as an element in the price to the purchaser.

"SEC. 8. Collection of tax from purchaser: The Commissioners shall by regulation prescribe a method or methods and a schedule or schedules of the amounts to be collected by vendors from purchasers in respect to any receipt upon which a tax is imposed by this title so as to eliminate fractions of 1 cent and so that the aggregate collections of taxes by a vendor shall, as far as practicable, equal 2 per centum of the total receipts from the sales and services of such vendor upon which a tax is imposed by this title. Such schedule or schedules may provide that no tax need be collected from the purchaser upon receipts from any sale the consideration of which is 50 cents or less, and may be amended from time to time so as to accomplish the purposes herein set forth. The tax imposed by this title on motor vehicles and vehicles which are propelled or moved by motor vehicles shall be paid as a condition precedent to the issuance of certificates of title therefor and the issuance of identification tags.

"SEC. 9. Every vendor shall keep records of receipts and of the tax payable thereon in such form as the Commissioners may by regulation require. Such records shall be offered for inspection and examination at any time upon demand by the Assessor and shall be preserved for a period of three years.

"SEC. 10. Returns: (a) Every vendor shall file with the Assessor a return of his receipts and of the taxes payable thereon for the periods ending September 30, December 31, March 31, and June 30 of each year.

"(b) Such returns shall be filed within twenty days from the expiration of the period covered thereby. The Assessor may permit or require returns to be made by other periods and upon such dates as he may specify: Provided, That the receipts during any year shall be included in returns covering such year and no other. If the Assessor deems it necessary in order to insure the payment of the tax imposed by this title, he may require returns to be made for shorter periods than those prescribed pursuant to the foregoing provisions of this section, and upon such dates as he may specify.

"(c) The form of returns shall be prescribed by the Assessor and shall contain such information as he may deem necessary for the proper administration of this title. The Assessor may require amended returns to be filed within twenty days after notice and to contain the information specified in the notice.

"SEC. 11. Payment of tax: At the time of filing a return of receipts each vendor shall pay to the Collector the taxes imposed by this title upon the receipts required to be included in such return, as well as all other moneys collected by the vendor acting or purporting to act under the provisions of this title even though it be judicially determined that the tax collected is invalidly imposed. All the taxes for the period for which a return is required to be filed shall be due from the vendor and payable to the Collector on the date limited for the filing of the return for such period, without regard to whether a return is filed or whether the return which is filed shows correctly the amount of receipts and the taxes due thereon.

"SEC. 12. Determination of tax: If a return required by this title is not filed, or if a return when filed is incorrect or insufficient, the amount of tax due shall be determined by the Assessor from such information as may be obtainable and, if necessary, the tax may be estimated on the basis of external indices, such as number of employees of the person concerned, rentals paid, stock on hand, income-tax returns, or other factors. Notice of such determination shall be given to the person liable for the collection of the tax from the purchaser and payment thereof to the Collector. Such determination shall finally and irrevocably fix the tax unless the person against whom it is assessed, within 30 days after the giving of notice of such determination, shall apply in writing to the Assessor for a hearing, or unless the Assessor of his own motion shall redetermine the same. After such hearing or redetermination the Assessor shall give notice of his final determination to the person against whom the tax is assessed.

"SEC. 13. Refunds: (a) Except as to any tax finally determined as provided in section 12, where any tax has been erroneously or illegally collected the tax shall be refunded if application is filed with the Assessor for such refund within 1 year from the payment thereof. For like cause and within the same period a refund may be made upon the certificates of the Assessor and the Collector. Whenever a refund is made upon the certificates of the Assessor and the Collector, the Assessor and Collector shall state their reasons therefor in writing. Such application may be made by the person upon whom such tax was imposed and who has actually paid the tax. Such application may also be made by a vendor who has collected and paid such tax to the Collector: Provided, That the application is made within 1 year of the payment by the purchaser to the vendor, but no actual refund of moneys shall be made to such vendor until he shall first establish to the satisfaction of the Assessor, under such regulations as the Commissioners may prescribe, that the vendor has repaid to the purchaser the amount for which the application for refund is made. In lieu of any refund required to be made, a credit may be allowed therefor on payments due from the applicant.

"(b) Application for a refund or credit made as herein provided shall be deemed an application for a revision of any tax, penalty, or interest complained of and the Assessor may receive evidence with respect thereto. After making his determination of whether any refund shall be made, the Assessor shall give notice thereof to the applicant.

"SEC. 14. Any person aggrieved by a final determination of tax as provided in section 12 or denial of an application for refund of any tax under section 13 may, within 90 days from the date of the final determination of the tax or from the date of the denial of an application for refund, as the case may be, appeal to the Board of Tax Appeals for the District of Columbia in the same manner and to the same extent as set forth in sections 3, 4, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12 of title IX of the act entitled 'An act to amend the District of Columbia Revenue Act of 1937, and for other purposes,' approved May 16, 1938, as amended, and as the same may hereafter be amended. The remedy provided in this section shall not be deemed to take away from the taxpayer any remedy which he might have under any other provision of law, but no suit by the taxpayer for the recovery of any part of any tax shall be instituted in any court if the taxpayer has elected to file an appeal with respect to such tax with the Board of Tax Appeals for the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 15. The taxes imposed by this title and penalties and interest thereon may be collected by the Collector in the manner provided by law for the collection of taxes due the District on personal property in force at the time of such collection; and liens for the taxes imposed by this title and penalties thereon may be acquired in the same manner that liens for personal property taxes are acquired. If the Assessor believes that the collection of any tax imposed by this act will be jeopardized by delay, he shall, whether or not the time otherwise prescribed by law for making return and paying such tax has expired, immediately assess such tax (together with all interest and penalties, the assessment of which is provided for by law). Such tax, penalties, and interest shall thereupon become immediately due and payable, and immediate notice and demand shall be made by the Collector for the payment thereof. Upon failure or refusal to pay such tax, penalty, and interest, collection thereof by distraint shall be lawful.

"SEC. 16. Whenever there is made a sale, transfer, or assignment in bulk of any part or the whole of a stock of merchandise or of fixtures, or of merchandise and of fixtures pertaining to the conducting of the business of the seller, transferor, or assignor, otherwise than in the ordinary course of trade and in the regular prosecution of said business, the purchaser, transferee, or assignee shall at least 5 days before taking possession of such merchandise, fixtures, or merchandise and fixtures, or paying therefor, notify the Assessor by registered mail of the proposed sale and of the price, terms, and conditions thereof, whether or not the seller, transferor, or assignor has represented to or informed the purchaser, transferee, or assignee that he owes any tax pursuant to this title or whether he has complied with section 1 of the act entitled 'An act to prevent the fraudulent sale of merchandise in the District of Columbia,' approved April 28, 1904, or whether or not he has knowledge that such taxes are owing, or whether any such taxes are in fact owing.

"SEC. 17. Whenever the purchaser, transferee, or assignee shall fail to give the notice to the Assessor as required by the preceding section, or whenever the Assessor shall inform the purchaser, transferee, or assignee that a possible claim for such tax or taxes exists, any sums of money, property, or choses in action, or other consideration, which the purchaser, transferee, or assignee is required to transfer over to the seller, transferor, or assignor shall be subject to a first priority right and lien for any such taxes theretofore or thereafter determined to be due from the seller, transferor, or assignor to the District, and the purchaser, transferee, or assignee is forbidden to transfer to the seller, transferor, or assignor any such sums of money, property, or choses in action to the extent of the amount of the District's claim. For failure to comply with the provisions of this subdivision, the purchaser, transferee, or assignee shall be personally liable for the payment to the District of any such taxes theretofore or thereafter determined to be due to the District from the seller, transferor, or assignor, and such liability may be assessed and enforced in the same manner as the liability for tax under this title.

"SEC. 18. Regulations: In addition to the powers granted to the Commissioners in this title, they are hereby authorized and empowered to make, adopt, and amend rules and regulations appropriate to the carrying out of this title and the purposes thereof.

"SEC. 19. In addition to the powers granted to the Assessor in this title, he is hereby authorized and empowered—

"(a) To extend for cause shown the time of filing any return for a period not exceeding 30 days; and for cause shown, to remit penalties and interest in whole or in part except as provided in section 22 of this title; and to compromise disputed claims in connection with the taxes hereby imposed.

"(b) To request information from the Bureau of Internal Revenue of the Treasury Department of the United States relative to any person for the purpose of assessing taxes imposed by this title; and said Bureau of Internal Revenue is authorized and required to supply such information as may be requested by the Assessor relative to any person for the purpose herein provided.

"(c) To prescribe methods for determining the receipts from sales made or services rendered and for the allocation of such receipts into taxable and nontaxable receipts.

"(d) To require any vendor selling to persons within the District to keep detailed records of the nature and value of personal property sold for use within the District and the names and addresses of the purchasers, where such sales are not subject to the tax imposed by this title, and to furnish such information upon request to the Assessor.

"(e) To assess, determine, revise, and readjust the taxes imposed under this title.

"SEC. 20. The Assessor, for the purpose of ascertaining the correctness of any return filed as required by this title, or for the purpose of making a return where none has been made, is authorized to examine any books, papers, records, or memoranda of any person bearing upon the matters required to be included in the return and may summon any person to appear before him and produce books, records, papers, or memoranda bearing upon the matters required to be included in the return and to give testimony or answer interrogatories under oath respecting the same, and the Assessor, or his duly authorized representative, shall have power to administer oaths to such person or persons. Such summons may be served by any member of the Metropolitan Police Department. If any person, having been personally summoned, shall neglect or refuse to obey the summons issued as herein provided, then in that event the Assessor, or the Deputy Assessor, may report that fact to the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, or one of the justices thereof, and said court or any justice thereof hereby is empowered to compel obedience to said summons to the same extent as witnesses may be compelled to obey the subpenas of that court. Any person in custody or control of any books, papers, records, or memoranda bearing upon the matters required to be included in such returns, who shall refuse to permit the examination by the Assessor or any person designated by him of any such books, papers, records, or memoranda, or who shall obstruct or hinder the Assessor or any person designated by him in the examination of any books, papers, records, or memoranda, shall upon conviction thereof be fined not more than $500.

"SEC. 21. Registration: (a) On or before the sixtieth day after approval of this act but not prior to July 1, 1947, or in the case of vendors commencing business after July 1, 1947, or opening new places of business after such date, within 3 days after such commencement or opening, every vendor and every person purchasing tangible personal property for resale shall file with the Assessor a certificate of registration in a form prescribed by the Assessor. The Assessor shall within 5 days after such registration issue without charge to each vendor or person who purchases for reseale a certificate of authority empowering such vendor to collect the tax from the purchaser. Duplicates of such certificate shall be obtained from the Assessor for each additional place of business of such vendor. Each certificate or duplicate shall state the place of business to which it is applicable. Such certificates of authority shall be prominently displayed to the public in the places of business of the vendor. A vendor who has no regular place of doing business shall attach such certificate to his cart, stand, truck, or other merchandising device. Such certificates shall be nonassignable and nontransferable and shall be surrendered within 3 days to the Assessor upon the vendor's ceasing to do business at the place named.

(b) A vendor shall refuse to accept a certificate that any property or service upon which a tax is imposed by this title is purchased for resale and shall collect the tax imposed by this title unless the purchaser shall have filed a certificate of registration and received a certificate of authority to collect the tax imposed by this title: Provided, however, That the payment of the tax by such purchaser shall not relieve the purchaser of the duty herein imposed upon such purchaser to collect the tax upon any resale made by him; but such purchaser who shall file a certificate of registration and receive a certificate of authority to collect the tax may, upon application therefor, receive a refund of the taxes paid by him upon property and services thereafter resold by him and upon the receipts from which he shall have collected and paid over to the Collector the tax herein imposed.

"SEC. 22. Penalties and interest: (a) Any person failing to file a return or to pay or pay over any tax to the Collector within the time required by this title shall be subject to a penalty of 5 percent of the amount of tax due, plus interest at the rate of 1 percent of such tax for each month of delay excepting the first month after such return was required to be filed or such tax became due; but the Assessor, if satisfied that the delay was excusable, may waive all or any part of such penalty in excess of interest at the rate of 6 percent per year. Such penalties and interest shall be paid and disposed of in the same manner as other revenues from this title. Unpaid penalties and interest may be collected in the same manner as the tax imposed by this title.

"(b) Officers of a corporate vendor shall be personally liable for the tax collected or required to be collected by such corporation under this title, and subject to the penalties hereinabove imposed.

"(c) The certificate of the Collector or Assessor, as the case may be, to the effect that a tax has not been paid, that a return or registration certificate has not been filed, or that information has not been supplied pursuant to the provisions of this title, shall be presumptive evidence thereof: Provided, That the presumptions created by this subsection shall not be applicable in criminal prosecutions.

"SEC. 23. Returns to be secret: (a) Except to any official of the District, having a right thereto in his official capacity, it shall be unlawful for any officer or employee of the District to divulge or make known in any manner the amount of receipts or any particulars relating thereto or the computation thereof set forth or disclosed in any return required to be filed under this title, and neither the original nor a copy of any such return desired for use in litigation in court shall be furnished where neither the District nor the United States is interested in the result of such litigation whether or not the request is contained in an order of the court: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the furnishing to a taxpayer a copy of his return upon the payment of a fee of $2.

"(b) Nothing contained in section 23 (a) of this title shall be construed to prohibit the publication of notices authorized in section 27 of this title, or the publication of statistics so classified as to prevent the identification of particular returns or reports and the items thereof, or the publication of delinquent lists showing the names of persons, vendors, or purchasers who have failed to pay the taxes imposed by this title within the time prescribed herein, together with any relevant information which in the opinion of the Assessor may assist in the collection of such delinquent taxes.

"(c) Nothing contained in section 23 (a) of this title shall be construed to prohibit the Assessor, in his discretion, from divulging or making known any information contained in any report, application, or return required under the provisions of this title other than such information as may be contained therein relating to the amount of receipts or tax thereon or any particulars relating thereto or the computation thereof.

"(d) Any violation of the provisions of this section shall be a misdemeanor and shall be punishable by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment for 6 months, or both, in the discretion of the court.

"(e) All reports, applications, and returns received by the Assessor under the provisions of this act shall be preserved for 3 years, and thereafter until the Assessor orders them to be destroyed.

"SEC. 24. Penalty for failure to file returns, and so forth: (a) Any person required to file a return or report or perform any act under the provisions of this title who shall fail or neglect to file such return or report or perform such act within the time required shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $300 for each and every failure or neglect, and each and every day that such failure or neglect continues shall constitute a separate and distinct offense. The penalty provided herein shall be in addition to the other penalties provided in this title.

"(b) Any person required to file a return or report or perform any act under the provisions of this title who willfully fails or refuses to file such return or report or perform such act within the time required shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than 1 year, or both, for each and every failure or refusal. The penalty provided herein shall be in addition to the other penalties provided in this title.

"SEC. 25. Assessment, reassessment, false, and incorrect returns: The Assessor shall determine, redetermine, assess, or reassess, any tax imposed by this title, except in cases where the tax is correct as computed in any return filed with the Assessor, within 3 years after the filing of any return, except as follows:

"(a) In the case of a false return or a failure to file a return, or failure to include taxable receipts in any return filed, whether in good faith or otherwise, the tax may be assessed at any time.

"(b) In the case of an incorrect return which has not been prepared as required by this title and by the return and instructions, rules, or regulations applicable thereto, the receipts reported shall be assessed or reassessed within 5 years after the filing of such return.

"SEC. 26. Prosecutions: All prosecutions under this title shall be brought in the Municipal Court for the District of Columbia on information by the Corporation Counsel of the District in the name of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 27. Notices: Any notice authorized or required under the provisions of this title may be given by mailing the same to the person for whom it is intended in an envelope, postage prepaid, addressed to such person at the address given in the last return filed by him pursuant to the provisions of this title or, if no return has been filed, then to the last address of such person. If the address of any person is unknown, such notice may be published in one or more of the daily newspapers in the District of Columbia for three successive days. The cost of any such advertisement in newspapers shall be added to the tax. The proof of mailing of any notice required or authorized in this title shall be presumptive evidence of the receipt of such notice by the person to whom addressed. The proof of publishing any notice required in this title in one or more of the daily newspapers in the District shall be conclusive notice to the person for whom such notice is intended.

"SEC. 28. Extensions of time: Where, before the expiration of the period prescribed herein for the assessment or redetermination of an additional tax, a taxpayer has consented in writing that such period be extended, the amount of such tax due may be determined at any time within such extended period. The period so extended may be further extended by subsequent consents in writing made before the expiration of the extended period.

"SEC. 29. If any provision of this title, or the application thereof to any person or circumstances, is held invalid, the remainder of this title, and the application of such provisions to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

TITLE II—COMPENSATING USE TAX

"SEC. 1. Definitions: (a) When used in this title the following terms shall mean or include:

"(1) 'Use': The exercise of any right or power over tangible personal property by the purchaser thereof and includes but is not limited to the receipt, storage, or any keeping or retention for any length of time, withdrawal from storage, any installation, any affixation to real or personal property or any consumption of such property.

"(2) 'Sale' or 'purchase': Any transfer of title or possession or both, exchange or barter, rental, lease, or license to use or consume, conditional or otherwise, in any manner or by any means whatsoever for a consideration, or any agreement therefor.

"(3) 'Vendor': Every person making sales of tangible personal property in the District: Provided, however, That, when in the opinion of the assessor it is necessary for the efficient administration of this title to regard any salesman, representative, peddler, or canvasser as the agent of the dealer, distributor, supervisor, or employer under whom he operates or from whom he obtains the tangible personal property sold by him, the Assessor may, in his discretion, treat and regard such agent as the vendor jointly responsible with his principal, employer, or supervisor for the collection and payment over of the tax.

"(4) 'Purchase at retail': A purchase by any person for any purpose other than for resale in the form of tangible personal property.

"(5) 'Tangible personal property': Corporeal personal property of any nature.

"(b) The definitions of 'person,' 'retail sale,' or 'sale at retail,' 'return,' 'District,' 'Commissioners,' 'Assessor,' and 'Collector,' as defined in section 1 of title I of this act, are hereby incorporated in and made applicable to this title.

"SEC. 2. Imposition of tax: Beginning 60 days after approval of this act but not prior to July 1, 1947, there is hereby imposed and there shall be paid by every person a tax on the use within the District of any tangible personal property purchased at retail. Such tax shall be at the rate of 2 percent of the consideration given or contracted to be given for such property or its use plus the cost of transportation, except where such cost is stated and charged separately.

"SEC. 3. Exemptions: The provisions of this title shall not apply—

"(a) In respect to the use of property used by the purchaser in the District prior to the date on which the tax is imposed by this act.

"(b) In respect to property which is in transit through the District, or which is stored and not used in the District but is so stored solely for the purpose of awaiting further transit through the District.

"(c) In respect to the use of property if the sale thereof has already been or will be subject to tax under title I of this act.

"(d) In respect to the use of property purchased at retail, upon the sale of which the purchaser would be exempt from the taxes imposed under title I of this act.

"(e) In respect to the use by any one person of property purchased from a vendor not maintaining a place of business in the District where the aggregate value of such property subject to the tax imposed by this title is less than $25 in value during any quarterly period.

"(f) In respect to the use of property which is converted into or becomes an ingredient or constituent part of, or is transformed or wrought into, attached to or sold with, a product or commodity produced or manufactured for sale by the purchaser.

"(g) In respect to the use of property by any person who comes into the District on or after the date on which the tax is imposed by this act and establishes a temporary or permanent residence in the District, or engages in any trade or business or commercial activity in the District, if such property was purchased at retail by such person not less than 1 year prior thereto.

"(h) In respect to the use of property if the sale or purchase thereof has been taxed by a taxing jurisdiction other than the District, and if such tax was paid by the person who brings such property into the District: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any sales or excise tax imposed or paid for Federal revenue purposes: And provided further, That if a tax on the sale or purchase of property is imposed by and paid to any taxing jurisdiction other than the District is less than the tax imposed by this title, the difference between such taxes shall not be exempted under this section.

"SEC. 4. Vendor to collect tax from purchaser; unlawful to advertise tax will be assumed or absorbed: (a) Every vendor maintaining a place of business in the District and making sales of tangible personal property the use of which is taxable under this title, and every other vendor who, upon application to the Assessor, has been expressly authorized to collect the tax, shall at the time of making such sales, or if the use is not then taxable hereunder, at the time such use becomes taxable hereunder, collect the tax from the purchaser. The tax to be collected shall be stated and charged separately from the sale price and shown separately on any record thereof, at the time when the sale is made or evidence of sale issued or employed by the vendor, and shall be paid by the purchaser to the vendor as trustee for and on account of the District, and the vendor shall be liable for the collection thereof and for the tax. The vendor and any officer of any corporate vendor shall be personally liable for the tax collected or required to be collected under this title, and the vendor shall have the same right in respect to collecting the tax from the purchaser, or in respect to nonpayment of the tax by the purchaser, as if the tax were a part of the purchase price of the property and payable at the time of the sale: Provided, That the Collector shall be joined as a party in an action or proceeding to collect the tax. No vendor shall advertise or hold out to the public in any manner, directly or indirectly, that the tax imposed by this title is not considered an element in the price to the purchaser.

"(b) Where the vendor has not collected a tax imposed by this title, such tax shall be payable by the purchaser directly to the Collector and it shall be the duty of the purchaser to file a return thereof and pay the tax imposed thereon as provided in sections 7 and 8 of this title.

"(c) For the purpose of the proper administration of this title and to prevent evasion of the tax hereby imposed, it shall be presumed that the use of tangible personal property is subject to tax until the contrary is established, and the burden of proving that the use is not taxable shall be upon the vendor or the purchaser. Unless the vendor shall have taken from the purchaser a certificate signed by and bearing the name and address of the purchaser and the number of his registration certificate to the effect that the property was purchased for resale, the sale shall be deemed a retail sale.

"SEC. 5. Collection of tax from purchaser: The Commissioners shall by regulation prescribe a method or methods and a schedule or schedules of the amounts to be collected from purchasers in respect to any property the use of which is subject to tax under this title so as to eliminate fractions of 1 cent and so that the aggregate collections of taxes by a vendor shall, as far as practicable, equal 2 percent of the aggregate value of the tangible personal property sold. Such schedule or schedules may provide that no tax need be collected from the purchaser upon receipts from any purchase the consideration of which is 50 cents or less, and may be amended from time to time so as to accomplish the purposes herein set forth. The tax imposed by this title on motor vehicles and vehicles which are propelled or moved by motor vehicles shall be paid as a condition precedent to the issuance of certificates of title therefor and the issuance of identification tags.

"SEC. 6. Records to be kept: Every person shall keep records of sales and of the tax payable in connection therewith and also records of purchases in such form as the Commissioners may by regulation require. Such records shall be offered for inspection and examination at any time upon demand by the Assessor and shall be preserved for a period of 3 years.

"SEC. 7. Returns: (a) Every vendor maintaining a place of business in the District and every vendor not maintaining such place of business but who, upon application to the Assessor, has been expressly authorized to collect the tax, shall file with the Assessor a return for the quarterly periods ending September 30, December 31, March 31, and June 30 of each year, showing the aggregate value of the tangible personal property sold by the vendor, the use of which became subject to the tax imposed by this title during the preceding quarterly period.

"(b) Every person purchasing tangible personal property, the use of which is subject to the tax imposed by this title, and who has not paid the tax due hereunder to a vendor required or authorized to collect the tax, shall file with the Assessor a return for such quarterly periods, showing the value of the tangible personal property purchased by such person, the use of which became subject to the tax imposed by this title during the respective quarterly periods and with respect to which the tax was not paid to a vendor required or authorized hereunder to collect the tax.

"(c) The provisions of section 10 (b) and (c) of title I are hereby incorporated in and made applicable to this title.

"SEC. 8. Payment of tax: At the time of filing the return the vendor or purchaser, as the case may be, shall pay to the Collector the taxes imposed by this title as well as all other moneys collected by the vendor acting or purporting to act under the provisions of this title even though it be judicially determined that the tax collected is invalidly imposed. All the taxes for the period for which a return is required to be filed shall be due from the vendor or purchaser, as the case may be, and payable to the Collector on the date limited for the filing of the return for such period, without regard to whether a return is filed or whether the return which is filed correctly shows the amount of receipts and the taxes due thereon.

"SEC. 9. Registration: (a) On or before the sixtieth day after approval of this act but not prior to July 1, 1947, or in the case of vendors commencing business or opening new places of business after such date, within 3 days after such commencement or opening, every vendor selling tangible personal property for use within the District and maintaining a place of business in the District shall file with the Assessor a certificate of registration in a form prescribed by the Assessor. A person selling tangible personal property for use within the District but not maintaining a place of business in the District, may, if he so elects, likewise file a certificate of registration with the Assessor. The Assessor shall within 5 days after such registration issue without charge to each such vendor a certificate of authority empowering such vendor to collect the tax from the purchaser and duplicates thereof for each additional place of business of such vendor. Each certificate or duplicate shall state the place of business to which it is applicable. Such certificates of authority shall be prominently displayed in the places of business of the vendor. A vendor who has no regular place of doing business shall attach such certificate to his cart, stand, truck, or other merchandising device. Such certificates shall be nonassignable and nontransferable and shall be surrendered within 3 days to the Assessor upon the vendor's ceasing to do business at the place therein named. The provisions of this section shall not be applicable to vendors and persons who have filed certificates of registration pursuant to section 21 (a) of title I.

"(b) The provisions of section 21 (b) of title I are hereby incorporated in and made applicable to this title.

"SEC. 10. The provisions of sections 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, and 29 of title I of this act are hereby incorporated in and made applicable to this title.

"SEC. 11. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia not to exceed the sum of $20,000 for the employment of persons specially qualified in the field of sales tax law in connection with the administration of this act. Such sum shall be available for expenditure for personal services without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes and to the civil service laws and to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended."

Mr. HORAN (interrupting the reading of the amendment). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the amendment be considered as read.

Mr. FORAND. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, we should know what is in the amendment.

Mr. HORAN. This is the Dirksen bill, I would say to my colleague.

Mr. FORAND. But there are very few Members who know anything about it. I think it should be read.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman would yield, what the gentleman from Washington proposes here is a completely new title that embraces a sales tax of 2 percent without any exclusions or exemptions as to commodities and so forth. The gentleman said it was the Dirksen bill. As a matter of fact, it is not except in this sense: It was proposed by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, as part of a program that embraces 9 different taxes. The chairman of the committee in rendering the usual customary official courtesy to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia introduced this bill, whether he agreed with this bill or any such bills or not; and it does bear my name, of course, but only because of the official rule. What is proposed here now is a so-called sales tax, and I see no reason why the amendment should be read, because the gentleman from Washington will explain it in detail.

Mr. FORAND. Does the gentleman say that everything is going to be taxed and that there will be no exemptions?

Mr. HORAN. Unless the committee should decide otherwise.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right. There are no exemptions involved. It is a straight across-the-board sales tax.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORAN] is recognized in support of his amendment.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORAN. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. I would like to point out some of the reasons why there should be so few, if any, exemptions. There is the expense of collection involved and additional appropriations.

Mr. HORAN. All exemptions lead to abuses sooner or later. Put that down in your book right now. All experience with sales taxes indicates that exemptions are a weakness rather than a strength and leave the door open to abuses. There are some exemptions included here, however, because of a previous Federal tax. I will briefly explain what this amendment which I have offered does.

This amendment provides for inclusion of a sales tax in the bill reported out by the fiscal committee. It would appear as article II, entitled "Sales and Compensating Use Tax." It is the same tax bill as introduced by Mr. DIRKSEN as H. R. 2290, but with the following amendments:

First. It strikes from section 3, subsection (a), paragraph (1), exemptions of cereals and cereal products, milk and milk products, meat and meat products, fish, eggs, vegetables and fruits, tea, cocoa, drugs, medicines, and so forth. It is my opinion that to have such exemptions makes the difficulty of collection increase, and also makes for an unmoral opportunity to cheat on the part of the retailer.

The amendment as proposed does exempt motor-vehicle fuels and alcoholic beverages because a tax is already levied against these items. It exempts all materials used in the initial construction of structures and in major structural alterations.

Second. This amendment further amends H. R. 2290 by providing for collection by distraint upon refusal to pay tax, penalty, and interest. This change was suggested by the District corporation counsel after the bill had been originally introduced.

Third. One further amendment to H. R. 2290 is provided for in the added section, section 11 of the use-tax provision, which amendment provides for authorization of persons specially qualified to administer this act in the sum of $20,000 without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes and to civil-service laws, and to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

I make this point—if we pass this bill—and I tell you that I know something about it because we are having hearings on the District budget right now and have to assume the tax program it suggests, the bill before you now is not adequate for the job. We must remember that this city is supplying police service and other services to hundreds of thousands of tourists. These services have greatly increased and run into millions of dollars. The burdens on the District of Columbia are increasing tremendously in every respect and yet the taxable area is fixed. The only tax that you can devise which will meet this situation is a sales tax. Those who ride should pay. That is the basis of a sales tax.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORAN. I yield.

Mr. FORAND. The gentleman said that those who ride should pay. Does he mean that there will be tax on taxicab rides?

Mr. HORAN. It does not so provide.

Mr. FORAND. And also an additional tax on admission to the movies as well as on bread and milk for children, and busses and streetcars?

Mr. HORAN. Let us assume that if we are going to have Government service and we are going to have all of this $13,000,000 a year welfare work projected now that it takes money. Nobody likes taxes, but you must raise the money.

Mr. FORAND. In other words, it is an over-all tax.

Mr. HORAN. That is right.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORAN. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Can the gentleman give us an estimate as to the revenues which may accrue from this amendment?

Mr. HORAN. It has been estimated, with the exemptions as so amended, to produce as high as $15,000,000 a year, but there are plenty of people who know something about it who say it would raise more money than that. Certainly, if we are going to take up the backlog of construction and capital outlay which faces the District, and which has been authorized by the Congress, $130,000,000 worth of which is still awaiting in capital outlay alone, we can see that we have a difficult tax problem. And we are not meeting it this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the gentleman also mention about the school system and the requirements there?

Mr. HORAN. As pointed out by the gentleman, we have 20 schools in the District right now that are on part-time classroom work. It is estimated that somewhere between four and seven million dollars is necessary right now to keep the school children in school for a full day. It is estimated by Dr. Corning, Superintendent of the District Schools, that it is only a matter of weeks until the juvenile-delinquency problem will become a tremendous problem in the District, because of so many children being forced into leisure, during the afternoons particularly.

Mr. MACKINNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORAN. I yield.

Mr. MACKINNON. This sales-tax provision has no exemptions, you say. Does it cover building materials?

Mr. HORAN. The exemptions are listed. These amendments exempt certain initial materials going into construction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to speak out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, Government officials and officials of farm loan agencies are meeting in Washington today to seek a way to halt recent wild increases in farm-land prices, according to present reports in the morning papers.

One hundred insurance companies, Federal land bank officials, farm-loan investors, and farm-organization officers have been summoned to the Washington meeting. Among those attending will be State officials of both Maryland and Virginia. According to the announcement, farm-land prices throughout the Nation now average 92 percent above the 1935–39 price level.

According to the report, the Secretary of Agriculture is expected today to urge private-loan agencies to bear down on farm loans from now on. He will ask insurance companies and other lending agencies, it is reported, to follow the Government's lead in farm financing.

The press carries a statement to the effect that Government-controlled Federal land banks now refuse to lend more than 65 percent of what they term "normal agricultural value of a farm." This value is defined as the amount a prudent farmer will be willing to pay in the expectation of average production in normal prices in farm commodities. Normal prices are defined as those which may be expected over a long period in the future—a period reasonably free from inflation or depression. According to the announcement, present farm-products prices are slightly more than double those which Government lending institutions consider normal. They are 150 percent above the more normal prewar period 1935–39 level.

It is difficult for me to understand how the press could carry the story to the effect that Government-controlled Federal land banks now refuse to lend more than 65 percent of what they term "normal agricultural values of a farm," when, as a matter of fact, the 65-percent limitation is a limitation fixed by law, a limitation which Federal land banks cannot exceed. The significant thing, however, about bearing down on farm loans and the Government's lead in farm financing is the fact that the present Governor of the Farm Credit Administration is now urging the passage of H. R. 3330, which is now pending before the House Committee on Agriculture, the very purpose of which bill is to lift the 65 percent of normal value limitation to 75 percent, to the end that Federal land banks might make more liberal loans on farm land. It is more than passing strange that while an agency of the Government, the Farm Credit Administration, is calling upon Congress to authorize a more liberal lending program, a conference is being held in Washington, and we are told that Government officials will advise insurance companies and private lending agencies to bear down on farm loans.

In testifying before the House Committee on Agriculture on Thursday, May 15, 1947, Hon. Ivy W. Duggan, Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, stated that according to a study made by the Farm Credit Administration—

There is a definite need for loans up to 75 percent of normal agricultural value if the mortgage credit requirements of agriculture are to be served adequately. This has been true ever since the establishment in 1933 of the normal value concept in making appraisals. An analysis of all land-bank loans made since 1933 indicates clearly that many farmers would not have been able to obtain their full mortgage-credit requirements from the land bank if there had been no Commissioner lending authority.

Governor Duggan stated further that—

Since July 1, 1945, when the land banks began operating under the 65-percent lending authority, the banks have made a determined effort to serve the credit needs of farmers without the use of Commissioner funds. They have found that the extent to which borrowers ordinarily could be expected to take up the difference between a 65-percent Federal land-bank loan and a 75-percent Commissioner loan, either from their own resources or from other lenders, is uncertain, especially during periods when farm income and economic conditions generally are less favorable than present conditions. The study made of applications received by the banks from July 1, 1945, through December 1945 disclosed that in a great many instances the difference between a 65-percent loan and a 75-percent loan was the margin that enables a returned veteran or a young tenant farmer to complete the purchase of a farm and establish himself as an owner-operator.

Governor Duggan pointed out further that—

We have made loans to veterans since 1944 in the amount of $13,000,000.

And stated further that—

Although at the present time farmers generally are in good financial condition, and most lenders give agricultural loans a high-credit rating, there is still a genuine need for loans of 75 percent of normal agricultural value. Past experience shows that this need will be much greater when conditions are less prosperous.

Special loans as provided for in H. R. 3330 have a definite place in the long-term mortgage field.

The thing that Mr. Duggan is actually worried about is that private lending agencies, managed and operated by the businessmen of America, who have with foresight and vision managed their own affairs, are making loans more liberal than his agency is authorized by law to make. The result is that private capital, through the operation of the private enterprise system, is now meeting the needs of farmers as never before in history. This activity on the part of private capital has decreased the volume of Governor Duggan's business and he is urging Congress to authorize him to make more liberal loans, while the Secretary of Agriculture is urging private lending agencies "to bear down on farm loans."

"CONSISTENCY, THOU ART A JEWEL"

In this connection, Governor Duggan stated to our committee that—

The Federal land banks need a sufficient volume of new loans to enable them to maintain an organization of sufficient efficiency and importance in the farm mortgage field to render adequate and effective service to farmers who need and prefer the cooperative type of credit service. * * * In order to maintain an effective organization, there must be a sufficient flow and volume of business to provide enough earnings to keep such an organization functioning at all times.

The question is, Does Governor Duggan want more liberal lending authority so that he will be able to maintain an effective organization, or does he consider such liberal lending authority essential to the farm credit needs of the Nation?

I do not think that Governor Duggan will deny the fact that he is the person responsible for having initiated the conference which is meeting in Washington today. From the information I have received, he is the person who at least supplied the substance of the letter written by the President to the Secretary of Agriculture, suggesting the calling of such a conference. For years the present Governor of the Farm Credit Administration has consistently and constantly done everything within his power to beat down farm land values, which represent most of the capital investment of the farmers of this Nation. He has made numerous speeches to this effect. He has traveled from one end of the country to the other in an effort to frighten the public, to the end that farm land values might be definitely and adversely affected.
